Should have extolled your work the more, if it had not praised me for ling to have those praises conferred on me, which he five more to telf concert then for , for to I may be thought like Theho doth extoff me molt; This is a weak fe incident to women to be taken more with with praises than deferts, for this I doe condemn my fex , and would not be ranked in this condition with them; nevertheleffe I doe account it a great glory, that fo deferving a Gentleman as your felf have drawn my picture with fo rich a pencill. In this pourtraid, the ornament of the rable doth farre furpaffe the excellence of the figure which you have made your Subject; had I any part of those graces which you impute unto me, my afflictions having wiped them away from outward observation, have wiped withall their rememberance from my memory; In a manner that beholding my felfe in your discourse, I could doe willingly as fometimes the old Lady of Rendan, who after her husbands decease having a long time forborn her looking glaffe, and having afterwards a fight of her felf in another glaffe by chance, the demanded who it was the faw there? And although my friends that fee me would reriwade me to the contrary, yet I doe fufped their judgements was having their eyes charmed with too much affection; I believe when you shall come unto the proofe, that in this you will be on my fide, and will fay as I doe often write out of the verses of Bellay.

Thus Rome in Rome was fought for

And nothing of Rome in Rome was found.

But as we take delight to reade of the destruction of Troy, of the glory of Athens, and of such mighty Cities when most they flourished, although the fignes of them are now fo small, that we hardly can discern where heretofore they stood, fo you take pleasure to describe the excellence of a beauty, of which there remains no wirnesse, nor appearence, but only in your writings. Had you done it to represent the contention of Nature and of Fortune, you could not have made choice of a more remarkable Subject, they both in me having to emulation made effay how far their powers could extend. In that of Nature, your selfe being an eye witnesse doe not need instructions; but in that of Fortune, being unable to make description but by report, which is subject to be delivered by persons ill informed, or ill affected, and who cannot represent the truth either through ignorance, or through malice, I prefume that you will take pleasure to receive these MEMO-RIALLS from her; who hath most reason to know them best, and who having greatest interest in them, can with greatest truth describe their Subject.

I have also been invited to it by five or fix remarkable observations in your difcourse which I have found defective, as when you speak of Pau, and of my voyage out of France, when you fpeak of the late Marshall of Biron, when you speak of Agen, and of the Marquis of Canillac. I will runne over my own Memorialls, to which I will not give a more glorious name, although they well deferve the ticle of a History, for the truth which they nakedly contain, being without any ornament of language, for which I have now neither the ability nor the leafure. This work then of one afternoon shall repaire to you in a rude and milhapen lump, like Bears new whelpt, to receive from you their beauty and proportion. It is a Chaos from whence already you have drawn the light. It is indeed a flory well worthy to be written by a Knight of Henor, a true Gentleman of France, born of the Illustrious family which was cherished by the Kings my Father, and my Brothers, and Cosin and familiar friend to the noblest and most accomplished Ladies of our time, it being my happineffe to be the Induction and the Tye, in the Society and the Union of them. The

The occurrences of the precedent with those of the succeeding times doe inforce me to begin in the reign of King Charles, & in the first time that in my remembrance there fell out any thing worthy of observa-For as the Geographers in the description of the Earth; when they are arrived to the utmost bound of all their knowledge, doe tell us that beyond that there are nothing but fandy Deferts, inhabitable Lands, and Seas innavigable; in the like manner will I say, that beyond that first rememberance of mine, there is nothing to be discovered, but a wilde of my first Infancy, an Infancy wherein we live, rather guided by Nature, after the manner of plants, and other creatures, then of men perswaded and counsailed by reafon; and I will leave unto those who were the governours of my nonage that superfluous enquiry, where peradventure among those actions of my Infancy, there will be found fome as worthy to be recorded, as that of the Infancy of Themiffecles, and Alexander, the one exposing himselfe in the middle of a Street to a Carters horses, who would not stay himselfe at his intreaties; the other despising the reward of the Olympique Race, if Kings might not contend with him for the honor or it. Or which number may be the anfwer that I made the King my Father tome few daies before the fatall blow that deprived France of peace, and our house of happinesse: Being then but foure, or five veers of age, my Father (holding me on his knee to hear me prattle) demanded f me, whom I would choose for my fervant, Monseiur the Prince of Joinville, who hath been fince the great and unforunate Duke of Guife, or the Marquis of Beaupreau, the sonne of the Prince of Roche-fur-you, in whose spirit, fortune having made too great a proofe of the excellency of it, conspired with envy to become his deadly enemy, depriving him by death in the fourteenth yeer of his age, of the honours and the Crowns which were justly promised to the vertue and magnanimity that shined in him; they were both at play with the King my Father, and with a fixed eye I did behold them: I made answer to my Father, that I would have the Marquis; wherefore fo replied the King? for (faid he) he is not to handsome, for the Prince of Joinville was of a ruddy colour and fair to look on, and the Marquis of Beaupreau was of a brown complexion, and haire: I told him, because he was the wifer; and because

Paule the other would never live in peace. but would be working mischiefe to one or other, and one who ever would frive for masterdome; a true presage of what we fince have feen, and the reliftance which I made to persevere in my Religion at the time of the Colloquy at Poiffy, when all the Court was inclined to the new Religion by the imperious perswafions of many Lords and Ladies of the Court, and especially of my Brother of Anjon, fince King of France, whose Infancy could not avoide an Impression of that Religion, who with inceffant importunity did call upon me to change my Religion, casting oftentimes my Howres into the fire, and giving me inftead of them, the praiers and pfalmes of the Huguenous, constraining me to take them, which as foon as I received, I gave them to Madame de Curton my governesse, whom God in mercy to me had preferved still a Catholick, and who oftentimes would goe with me to that good man the Cardinall of Tournon, who did counsaile and encourage me to fuffer all things for the maintenance of my Religion, and gave me new Howres and Beades in the place of those which my Brother of Anjon had burned; And some other friends of his who were zealous В

sealous to pervert me , observing me sgaine to weare them, transported with choler, would offer in jury unto me, affirming that it was meer childifinesse and folly that made me doe fo, faying it did well appear that I had no capacity, that all those who were of any discretion, of whatfoever age or fex they were, hearing grace preached, were retired from the abuses of the old Superstition, but I they faid, was as very a foole as my governeffe. And my Brother of Anjou, adding threats to his reproaches, would tell me, that the Queen my Mother should cause me to be whipped; but this he foake of himfelf, for the Queen my Mother knew not of the er rour into which he was fallen, and as foon as the did understand it, the did extreamly check him, and his governours and causing them to re-instruct him, the constrayaed them to return to the true, holy, and ancient Religion of our Fathers, from which the never did depart : But I replyed to fuch threatnings of my Brother, melting into teares, as the age of feven or eight yeers (at which I then was) is tender enough, that he might cause me to be beaten, and if he pleafed he might, cause me to be killed, that I would rather fuffor all the torments that cruelty could invent vent then pull damnation on my Soule. Many more fuch answers of mine and notes of refolution and of judgement might be found, in the discovery whereof I will no longer travaile, intending to begin my Memorialls with that time when I waited in ordinary on the Queen my Mother, to depart from her no more; For prefently after the Colloquy of Poiffy, that the warrs began, my Brother of Alenson and my felfe by reason of our tender age. were fent unto Ambois, whither all the Ladies of that Country retired themselves with us, there was your Annt the Lady of Dampierre, who then received me into her friendship, which she continued to her death, and there was your Cofin Madame the Durchesse of Rais, who in that place knew the favour that fortune had done her, by delivering her at the battell of Dreux from her afflicting husband Mon-Geur de Annebaut, a person too unworthy to possesse so perfect, and so divine a Sublect. I speak here of the beginning of the friendship of your Aunt with me, and not of your Cofin which we have preferved fo inviolate, that it continueth yer, and shall doe evermore. But then the age of your Aunt had a greater complacence with my Infancy, it being the nature of ancient people people to make much of little children, and those who are of perfect age as was then your Cofin, to be weary of them, and to hate their importunate simplicity. I did continue there untill the commencement of the great voiage, when the Queen my mother caused me to return to Court, to depart from thence no more, of which I will not speake at all, being then so young, that I cannot retain the remembrance of it but in groffe, the particulars being vanished from my memory like a dreame. I leave therefore the description of it to those who being then as you in a riper age, can remember in particular the magnificent triumphs that were made, especially at the Duke of Barrs at the Christening of my Nephew the Prince of Lorrain, at Lions at the welcome of Monfieur and Madame de Savoy, at Bayons at the enterview of the Queen of Spain my Sifter, and the Queen my Mother, and of King Charles my Brother. There I affure my felfe you will not forget to represent that flately banquet which the Queen my Mother made in the Iland, with the mask and manner of the hall, which Nature it feems had appropriated to that effect, there being discovered in the middle of the He, a great green where was a grove of

of high timber trees in an ovall form, round about which my Mother had caused great Neeches to be made, and in every Neech the had placed a round table for twelve persons, the table only of their Majesties with the cloath of State advanced it felf at the upper end of the hall, and was mounted on foure steps of green turfes of earth. All these tables were served by diverse troupes of Shepheards diversly apparelled with cloath of gold and Sattin, according to the diverse habits of all the Provinces of France. At the landing of the triumphant boats (in which their Ma jesties wasting from Bayons to the Ile, were alwaies attended by the way with the Musick of many of the Sea-gods, finging and rehearing verses round about them) these Shepheards were on the green, troup by troup apart, on both fides of a great Alley, cast up on purpose for their Majesties to goe to the said Hall, every troup playing and dancing according to the fashion of their Country: The Poitevines with their Cornets, they of Provence dancing lavaltoes with their Cimbals, the Burgundians and Champagnians with the Bagpipes, Treble viols, and Tabers, the Brittons dancing loftily with their fine nimble rifings, and as many turnings nings with it, and so accordingly of all the other Provinces. After the fervice of whom, and the Banquet ended, the Mufitians were discovered with a great troupe of Satyres to enter the great luminous rock, thining with artificiall light, but sparkling more with the jewelle and the beauties of the ladies that fate above, who comming down, did dance that most curious maske, the glory of which the Envie of Fortune not able to endure, came forming in with fo great a Tempest, that the confusion and wrack which among the boates that night had made, brought the next morning as great a subject of laughter, as the magnificent fetting forth of the maske before had brought delight. like was to be feen in all the brave Entries that were made to expresse the Principall Cities of this Kingdom, whose Provinces here represented they did visite.

In the Reigne of the mighty King Charles my Brother, some sew yeers after the return of the great voyage, the Hugenots having begun again the war, the King and Queen my Mother, being at Paris, a Gentleman of my Brothers of Anjou (who hath been since King of France) arrived to bring tidings from him, that he had brought the Huguenots army to such an extreamity, that he hoped in few dayes to force them to give him battell, before which time, hee did befeech them that he might have the bonour to fee them, to the end, that if Fortune envious of the glories which in fo young an age he had obtained, should in that defired expedition, after having done good fervice to his King, his Religion, and the State, con joyne his funeralls with the triumph of his victories, he might depart this world with leffe forrow, having fatisfied them both in that charge which they had done him the honor to commit and him. If these words bouched the heart of fo good amother, who did not live, but for her children only, to prefer whose lives and estates, she every houre abandoned her own, you are able to judge. Incontinently the resolved to depart with the King, taking with her a fina'l and usuall traine of Ladies, as the Lady de Rais, the Lady de Sauva, and my felfe Being burne on the wings of defire, and motherly affection, the dispatched the way betwint Paris, and Tours, in three daies, which was not without some inconvenience, and mamy Accidents worthy of laughter, occasioned by the poor Mounfieur, the Cardinall of Burben, who never did forfake her, although he was neither of garbe, of humour, nor complexion for to great a

Arriving at Tours, we found my Brot ther of Anjou, with the chiefe Commanders and Captaines of his Army, who were the flowers of the Printes and the Lords of France, in the presence of whom he made an Oration to the King, to give himan account of all the carriage of his charge fince his departure from the Court, composed with such art and eloquence, and delivered with fo much Grace, that he caused admiration in all the standers by The greennesse of his youth did so much the more advance and make apparent the wisedome of his words; that seemed more mitable with a gray beard, with an old experienced Captaine, than a young Gentleman of fixteen yeers of Age, whole brow the Laurells of two Conquests had already crowned, and Beauty which gives a greater grace to every Action, did & dourish in him, as if the were in emulation with Fortune, which of them both thould render him most glorious. The joy which my Mother did receive hereat, can no more by words be represented, then could the Griefe of the father of Ipbigenia; and in any other but her felf, whose soul was sever wedded to discretion, one might afily have perceived the exilience which such an excesse of joy had made, but the moderating her actions, as well the could, demonstrating apparently, that the Discreet doe nothing which they would not doe, without studdying to proclaime her joyes, or fretch in words those prayles which the Actions of so accomplished and deere a childe did merit, sook only the chiefe points of his oration, which concerned the actions of the warre, to deliberate on them with the Princes and the Lords there present, to take a thorough resolution for the war, and to provide things neceffary for it; for the disposing whereof, it was requifite to continue there fome cerraine daies, in one of which, the Queen my mother walking in the Parke, with some of the Princes, my Brother of Anjou inreated me that we might walke afide into in Alley, into which being come, he thus foake to me.

Sister, the education which we have had together, doth no lesse obliege us unto love, then the neernesse of our blood, and you have understood, that among all my brothers & sisters, I have ever had a greater inclination to wish well to you then unto any of them, and I have well observed that your nature hath ever borne to me the fame respects of love; hitherto we have been guided to it by Nature, not by coun fell, neither hath this Action brought tis any profit, but only the pleafure we have to converte together, This indeed was agreeable to our Infancy , but this Roure requires that we no longer live like children, you fee the great and honorable charges to which God hath called me, and to which the Queene, our good Mother, hath advanced me, you ought to believe that you being the onely thing in the world whom I doe most affect and cherist, I shall not be master of that greatfelle or fortune, of which you shall not be partaker. I know you have capacity and judgment to doe me good offices with the Queene my mother, to preferve me in that Fortune wherein I ffand, my principall intention is to labour to retaine her favor. I am afraid my absence will doe me wrong, and yet the warre, and the charge I have, constraine me almost to be alwayes absent; In the meane while, the King my brother is alwayes with her, doth please and flatter her in all things. I am afraid, at length it will prove prejudiciall to me, and that the King my brother comming to be great, and being full of courage, will not alalwayes minde the chace but ambitiour of change, will curne the chase of beaftsinto the chace of men, and taking away from me the charge of the Kings Leivrenant, which he hath given me, will leade the Army himself. This would prove to me fo great a Ruine, and a Griefe, that before I would receive fo great a fall, I would imbrace the most cruell death. In this apprehention, fludying the meanes to preventit. I finde it necessary for me to have fome faithfull persons that may make good my part with the Queen my mother, I know not any fo fit for this, as you, whom I have ever held for my fecond felf. You have all the parts that ean be defired for it, understanding, judgement, and fidelity, wherefore if you will so much obliege me, as to render your felfe observant ofher, defiring you to be always at her rifing, at her closet, at her lying downe, and briefly all the day, this will obliege her to communicate her felfe unto you, with this will I expresse unto her your ability, and what comfort and fervice the shall receive from your and I will intreat her no more to take you for a childe but to imploy you in my Ablence, as my felf, this I doe affure my felfe, that the will doe. Speak you to her with the fame confidence as to me, and 25affure your felfe, you shall finds her affable. This shall be to you a happinesse as great as good, to be beloved of her, and and herein you shall doe much for your self and me; and for my felf, I shall nexito God, acknowledge you to be the establishment of my fortunes.

This language feemed very trange to me, as having yet ever lived without imployment, and minding nothing befides hunting, and dencing, not having to much as the curlofity of affecting new fathions, or of feeming beautifull, as being yet not indebred to age for that Ambition, and I was trained up under the Queen my mo ther, with fuch conftraint and sweethar I durit not prefume to speak unto her only, but when the looked on me, with what speed I could, I would steale away for fear of doing something that might difpleafe her; infomuch I was about to answere him, as Mojes sometimes answered God out of the Vision of the Bulhy What am I, fend thou bim whom thou oughteft to find; Norwithstanding, finding in my felf (what I thought there had not been) those faculties flirred up by the object of his words, which before lay undifcovered to me, and being borne with foirit enough, returning to my felf from my former a-

florifiment, those words did much affect me, and me thought, that I was at that inhanta creature transformed, and was now become a thing of more account then heretofore I had beene, infomuch, that taking confidence in my felfe, I answered him; Brother, if God fhall give me the capacicie and boldnesse to talke unto the Queen my mother, as I have the will to doe you fervice in what you defire of me, affure your felfe, you thall receive that profit and content which you have propofed to your felfe, you have reason to be confident of me, for nothing in the world doth more honour and affect you then my felfe, procure only that I may be with the Queen my mother, and you shall be there your felf, I being only there for you. I expressed these words with my heart rather then my mouth, as the effects can wirneffe: for being departed from him, the Queen did call me to her closet, and faid. Your Brother bath told me the discourse that you have had together, and now no longer taketh you for a Childe, no more will I, it shall be a great comfort to me, tofpeakeroyou, as to your Brother. Render your felfdiligent and durifull, and be not afraid to speak freely to me, for I will have it for softhefe words did shoote such C 2 an unbounded joy into my fonle, as before it never apprehended, and me thoughts, that all the contents which I received till then . were but as fhaddows to this bliffe. with a difdainfull eye I looked back on the recreations and exercises of my infancy, as dancing, hunting and the companions of my childehood, despising all, as vain and foolifh: I did obey this pleafing comand, not failing a day to be with the first at her rifing, and with the last at her lying down, and the did methe honour to speake unto me fometimes two or three houres together, and God gave me the grace that the remained fo fatisfied therewith , that the could not fufficiently praise me to her women; Jealked to heralwayes of my Brothere and did advertise him of all occurrences with futh fidelity, as I breathed forth nothing but his defires.

In this happy estate I did remain some certain time with the Queen my Mother, during which the battell of Montcontour was fought, at the news whereof my Brother of Anjou who desired nothing more then to be with the Queen my Mother, sent her word that he was going to be-fiege Saint John d'Angeli, and that the Kings and her presence would be of much importance at the siege. Shee more desirous then himfelf to come, refolved prefently to depare, attended onely with her ordinary train, of which I was one, and I went with her extreamly joyous, not forefeeing the enfuing mitchiefe which fortune had prepared. Too young as I was, and unexperienced I did not suspect my happineffe, and believing the prosperity I enjoyed to be permanent, I collected to my felfe i perperuity of my fortune, but my envious starrs that could not support she continuance of fo happy a condition did provide nie as much affliction at my arrivall, as I promifed to my felfe pleafure by my fidelity by which I thought to have obliged my Brother; for in his ablence from Court; he had taken to him Le Gwaft, by whom he was so much poffessed, that he faw nor but by his eyes, nor spake but by his mouth: This wicked fellow born for mischiefe suddainly bewitched his spirit, and filled it with a thousand tyrannicall precepts, as that he ought not love or truft to any bot himfelfe, that he must not joyn any to his fortunes, no not his Brother, or his Sifter, and fuch goodly Marchivilian tenents, imprinting which in his understanding, and he resolving to pradifethem, as foon as we were come, after the first Calutations, my Mother began to comcommend me, and to cell him with what faith and diligence I had attended on her, beanswered her coldly, that he was glad ofit, but wifedome he faid did not permit, that the fould nie the fame expedients at all times, and what feemed necessary in one houre , might prove prejudiciall in another. She demanded of him , whatdid move him to to speake whereupon, he feeing the sime for his invention which he had contrived for my ruine, made answer that I was grown very beausifull, and that Monficur de Griff intended so be a fultor to me, being induced to it by his afpining Uncles, and if it came to paffethat I should affect him, it were to be suspected that I would discover to them what foever thing the cold me wille told her, that the was not ignorant of the anibition of that house, which had alwaies longha to suppresse and to rhine ours, for which occasion it were requisite, that the fould talke no more of affayres pinto me, but by deprees retire her felie and her familiarity from me; That very evening I found the change which that permicious Gouacell had wrought in her, and feeing the feared to speake unto me before my Brother, having commanded me three or foure times as the was calking so him to COM-

go to bed. I waited untill he was gone out of the chamber & then approaching to her did befeech ber to tell me if through my snorance were to unhappy, as to have done any thing which might displease her. At first the began to diffemble with me but in the end the faid, daughter your brotheris wife, you must not think ill of him, for that which I shall tell you tendeth unto good : the repeated then all the discourse that had past betwixt the, & comanded me to speak no more unto her before my brother. Thefe words were as manyneedles in my heart as the weren joy unto me when the receiwed me first into her favour; I omitted nothing to represent unto her my innosence, urging that what he talked of was a shing of which I never heard, and if any fuch thing thould happen, it thould no fooner be spoken to me, but forthwith I would acquaint her with it; But it advantaged nothing, my Brothers words had left such a deep impression in her heart that there was no roome for truth, or reafon; Seeing this, I told her that I was leffe sensible of the evill of the deprivation of bay happinesse, because I found no good by the acquifition of it, that my Brother might take me away, as he had given me, for he preferred me to her without merit, pray-C 4 prayfing me when I was unworthy and that he now deprived me of it without any defert , onely on an imaginary fabject which had no being but in his fancy but I befought her to believe, that I would for everpreferve the remembrance of what my Brother had done unto me herear the grew into a great choller, commanding me not to fhew the least appearance or figne of any thing. From that time daily more and more the diminished her favors, making her Sonne her Idoll, and indeavouring to content him in this and whatfoever elfe he defired of her. This afflicion oppressing my heart, and possessing all the faculties of my foule, rendered my body more apt to receive the contagion of the bad ayre, which was then in the army, infomuch that I fell within few daies after, to be extreamly fick of a malignant and spotted Feaver, a sicknesse which then ran fatally up and down, and which ar the fame time had born away two of the principall Phyfirians of the King and Queen, Chappellain and Caftelan, Intending, as it feems by taking away the Sheepheards to make a better market of their flock, and very few of those escaped who were infe-Acd. I being in this extremity the Queen my Mother who knew partly the cause of ît.

is comitted nothing that might cafe me, taking the pains without fearing the danger to come unto me every houre, which brought me much comfort, but the diffembling of my Brother did as much again augment my griefe, who after he had shewed himself so unfaithfull, and was guilty of fo great ingratitude, departed neither day nor night from my bed, attending as officiously on me, as in the time of our greatest friendship; but I who by commandment had my mouth thut, answered not his hipocrifie but by fighes (as Barrus formetimes did Nerve's, who died by the poyfon that the tyrant gave him) fufficiently witnesting unto him, that the cause of my ficknesse was the contagion of the evill offices that he had done and not of the infected ayre: but God had pitty on me, and delivered me from that danger, and after freen daies the army departing, they carried me in a Litter, where every evening retiring to my chamber , I found King Charles who took the pains with many other noble Gentlemen to convey my Litter to my Bed.

In this effate I came to Angeirs to Saint John de Angeli, fick of body, but more fick of minde, where to encrease my milery I found Monsieur de Guise and his Uncles arrived arrived, which rejoyced as much my Brother, giving fome colour to his former artifice, as It gave me the apprehension to increase my pain, where my Brother, the since to spin his chied, came every day unto my Chamber, bringing with him Monfieur de Guile, whom he counterfeiend to love entirely. And to give him cause to think to, he would oftentimes in imbracing him say unto him, I would to God you were my brother: To which Monfiette de Guise would make at though he did not inderstand him, but I who know his malice did loose all patience, and could not but tax himsor differabling.

About this time there was a report of ny marriage with the King of Foreigall, who fent his Embaffedours to demand me. The Queen my Mother enjoying me to prepare my felfe to receive them, which I did, but my Brother perturated here had by no means I would be ladueed to that marriage, the commence with me about it in the evening and demanded of me how I flood affected to it, thinking thereby to take an occasion to be angry with me; I replyed to her, that my will altogather depended upon hers, and whatever was pleasing unto her should be as agreeable unto me: She answered me in choller to which

which before they had railed her, that what I fpake unto her was not from my heart, and that the knew well, that the Gardinall of Lorrow had exhorted me to emercaine his Nephew, I befought her that the would be pleafed to come to the effect of the marriage with the King of Partugall, and the floude then perceive the fruits of my obedience; Every day brought in fomenew tidings concerning this Subject, to exasperate her the more, and to comene me, which were all levertiensobnerived in the thop of La Great In a manner that I had not one day of their, For on one fide the King of Spanishilatered that my marriage thould not beet and on the other fide, Mountieur il Galle be ing at Court, fervedalwayes as a pretext to furnish new Subjects of perfecution on me, although that neither he ther any of his kindred did ever fo much us fpeake unto me, and it was now more then a yeere. fince he was a faitor to the Princelle de Portid but because that mapriage was deferred, it reflected alwayes on this Marion, that he afpired unto mine, which I observing, refolved to write unto niv Sifter Madamide Lorrague, that could doe all in that House, increasing her to be a meanes that Monfieur de Guife might bo withdrawn -116 drawn from Court, and that the marriage might be dispatched betwint him and the Princesse dispatched betwint him and the Princesse dispatched betwint him and the Princesse dispatched as much for Monsieur de Gueza his ruine, as my owne; the truth of this stuine, as my owne; the truth of this marriage to be accomplished, by that meanes delivering me from detraction, and giving the Queen my mother to understand the truth of that which I had always faid. This stopped the mouthofall mine enemies, and gave me test.

In the mean while the King of Spaine. who would have note but his owne birds flicout of his owne well, quite brake off the marriage with the King of Portugall, and there was heard no more rumour of it. Somefew dayes after, there was a report of my matriage with the Prince of Navarre, who is now the brave and magnanimous King of France, and of my felf. My mother being one day as the Table, communed there a great while with Moufigur de Mora, because they of the House of Montmorancy were the first that made the motion. And rifing from the tables the sold me that the had fooken to him to conferre with me about it. I made answere, that I having no other will but here it were superfluous, but I befought her feriously to confider that I was a Catholike, and that it would be a great affliaion to me, to be married to one that was not of my Religion. Afterwards my Mother going to her closet, called me, and told me that the Lords of Montmorancy proposed againe that marriage to her; and that the willingly would know how I food affected. I replyed to her againe, that I had neither choice nor will, but what was hers, and befought her againe to remember, that I was a true Catholick. At the end of certaine daies, the report fill continuing, the Queen of Navarre, mother to the faid Prince came to Court. where the marriage was fully agreed upon before her death, to whom there happened a pretty Passage, which deserveth not indeed to be recorded in this story, but to be passed off in filence twixt you and me. Madam de Nevers, whose humour you well know, being come with Monsieur the Cardinall of Burbon, Madam de Guife, Madam the Princeffe of Conde, and her fifters, with my felf, to discharge the last duety due unto her dignicie and the proximity betwixt us, we found her not with the pompe and ceremonies of out Religion, but in the preciter annofaffed ed Huguenovety . Shehad about her ordinary bed the curtaines open, withoutlight, without Priefts, with our a Croffe o and withour Holy-water We kent our felves fome five or fine paces from hombbel with the reft of the companys Madanie de Nevers, whom in herille time the hated above all the creatures in the world, and who ever had resurred goodemto her for it, both in will and words, as you knew the would court her felf fairely to those she hated, departed from our troupe, and with many scacefull, humble and fubmiffive curtefies thee camenere unto herbed , and taking her by the hand, did kiffe it, and againe with a lowly commence and most full of humble respects, the withdrew her felfouncous, we who did know their hatred thinking that.

Some few moneths after, the Prince of Navarre, who then called himselfe King of Navarre, mourning for the Queene his mother, came thither, accompanied with Eighthundred Gentlemen all in blacks, and was received by the King and all the Courtwith great honor, and some few daies after, my Nuprialls were Solemnized with more magnificence and triumph then then was everlarly of my quality. The King of Navarre and his troupe had changed their blacks into habiliments most theh and gorgeous, and all the Court accounied, as you know, and can far better represented I was royally attired with the Growne Before me I had on a Robe of powdered Entines, which gliftered all o. verwith the sparkling stones that reflected from the Orowny and behind me the great blew Mantley the traine whereof being loure elles, was carried by three Princefles, the feaffoldswere fet up, asit is usuall at the marriages of the Daughters of France, from the Enefohe to our Ladies. and covered with cloth of Gold. The people thronged below to fee the wedding, and all the Court passed along upon the feaffolds. We came to the doore of the Church, where Monfieur the Cardinall of Bourbon , having received us to fay the words accustomed for such Solemnisies, did there theo flice for that day.

We being thus, Fortune who never grants unto mortality a perfect happinesse, changed soone after this happy estate of triumphs and of huptials into another elbane contrary, by the hurt which the Admirall received, which so offended those of the Religion, that it made them even desperate infomuch that old Pardails ian and fome other of the chiefe Hugue nots talked folloud to the Queen my mother that they made her conceive they had fome had imention : By the advise of Monfieur de Guife, and my Brother the King of Polonia, who fince hath been King of France, a counfell was taken to prevent them, a counfell to which King Charles was no way acceffary, who loved Monficur de la Rochefoncault, Teligny, la Noue and some others who were the chiefe of that Religion, whose service he did account to make ute of in Flanders, and I my felfe have heard him fince affirme, that with much difficultie and importunitle he conferred to it; and unleffe they had made him understand that his life and state were in the utmost jeopardy, he had never given way unto it; And having known the affault which Manravell had made on Monfieur the Admirall by a flot from a Pitoll, which he discharged out of a window, whereby thinking to kill him . hee was onely wounded in the houlder, the King suspecting truly, that Mauravel made that fhot , by perfwafion of Monsieur de Guise, in revenge of the death of his father the late Monfieur de Guife, whom the faid Admirall had caufed fed to be flain in the fame manner by Poltret , he was in fo great a choler against Monfieur de Guife that he swore he would fee Juffice executed, and if Monfieur de Quife had not withdrawn and hid himfelf all that day, the King had caused him to be apprehended, and the Queen my Mother had never more to doe then to make King Charles understand, that it was done for the benefit of his Estate, fo great an affection he did beare to Monsieur the Admirall, la Noice and Teligny, whose spirits and whose valour he well observed, being fonoble a Prince that he affected not any whom he faw not indued with fuch qualities, and though they had been most pernicious to the state, these foxes knew fo well to diffemble, that they had wonne the heart of this brave Prince, who hoped to make them profitable to him for the inlargement of his estate, they propounded to him great and glorious enterprifes in Flanders, the only attraction of that royall and mighty fpirit. An lakhough the Queen my Mother in this accident represented to him that the affailinate, which the Admirall made before on the Father of Monfieur de Guise did render, his Son excusable in taking vengeance himselfe on the Admirall, be-he could not have justice done him as also that alshough the affault which the dmirall bad made on Charry Hafter of the Campe (a perion whole valour had fo faithfully afficed Her during the time of her regency and his honage) did tender him worthy of luch intreaty, although that thele words might make the Ring con ceive, that the revenge for Charries death was deeply imprimed in my Mothers heart, yethis soule overcome with grief for the lotte of choic persons, whom he thought one day, as I have laid, would be advantagious to him, did to eccapite his indgement that he could in little moderate nor change his pallionate defire to fee inhice executed giving first commissed continually to fearth out and apprelished Montieur de Guile, proteiting that full an act thould not elcape mapunified. In the end as Parasillan at Tupper with the Queen my Mother discovered by his threats, the badd intention of the Philippe nots, and my Mother law that this accident had brought the affayres to fuch an exigence that if they prevented not their degainst the King and her, the tooke a relo lution throughly and plainly to acquaint the King with the cruth of all, and of the dan-anger in which he was. For this bufithe feletted Montieur the Manhall Rais, from whom the knew that the King would take it beft, as being one to whom the King imputed greatest trust, and one whom he most did tayour, who came unto the King about nine or ten of the clock in the Evening, and told him that as his most faithfull servant he could not conceale the danger wherein he was, if he persevered in that resolution to have Jufrice executed on Monfieur de Guife, and that it was requitite he undeflood that the wound which the Admirall received, was not only occasioned by Monlieur & Guije, but that my Brother the King of Polonia fince King of France, and the Queen my Mother were both abettors in it; that he knew the extream difoleafure that my Mother received at the affaffinate on Charry, as great reason the had for it, having then but few such serwants, who depended only on her, France being (as well he knew) in the time of his ponage divided, the Catholicks francing for Monfieur de Guife, and the Hugunote for the Prince of Conde, both of them arramating to disposses him of the Crown, which next to God was not prefer yed, but by the wildome and the vi-gilance of the Queen his Mother, who in her her extremity found bernot more faithfully affifted by any then by the faid Chary that also the observed that the laid Admirall was ever a most dangerous and perficious member of the State, and what-soever apparence he made of the affection rd file Majelty, and to feryehim in his wars in Flanders, his only defigne was to trouble France, that her intencion indeed was only to take a way the Plague of the Kingdome the Admirall, but mifetiele and misforin his thot, and that the Hughenots thereon were grown to desperately obitinate, "that not only attempting against Monsieur de Gui'e, the Queen his Mother, the King of Polonia his Brother, but believing that he himselfe was consenting to it, they were refolved that might to have their recour e to Acries, infomuch that he faw his Majelty In a great and most apparent danger, by the Catholickshy reason of Monsieur de Guife, and by the Huguenots for the reasons a-Bove mentioned. King Charles who was of great wiledome, and who alwayes had been most obedient to the Queen my Mother, and a most Catholick Prince, feeing how eminent was the danger, took a finddaine reforition to joyn himselfe to the Queen his Mother, and to conform himfelfe telfe to her will, and by the Catholiks to fecure his person from the Huguenous, but not without extream griefe, that he could not fave the lives of Teligny, la None, and Monfieur de la Rochefoncault : And going prefently himfelfe to finde the Oucen his Mother, he sent for Monsieur de Guise and all the other Princes, and Catholick Captains, where resolution was taken that very night to beginne the Maffacre of Saint Bars bolomen : And presently putting their hands unto the work, the chaines firerched forth, and the alarme beating, every one ran into his quarter (according to the order given) as well unto the Admirall as to the Huguenots : Monfieur de Guife beflowed himselfe on the lodging of the Admirall, into whose Chamber one Besme an Almaine Gentleman having mounted, after having stabbed him to death, did throw him our of the window to his mafter Monficur de Guife.

For my part I heard nothing of all this, I faw all the world in action. The Huguenous were strook into desperation by this affault, and the Lords de Gnist fearing the execution would not be hot enough, did whisper every man in the eare to see it thorowly performed: The Huguenous sufpersed me because I was a Catholick, and the Catholike furpetted me, because I was Espoused to the King of Navare, who was a Huguenot, fo that I heard nothing of it. untill that Evening , being at the lying down of the Queen my Mother, I fat on a Coffer neer unto my Siller of Lorraine whom I faw wonderfully pensive: The Queen my Mother conferring with some there present, perceived where I sate, and commanded me to go to bed; As I was a making my courtefy unto her, my Sifter took me by the arme and held me by it, and burfting forth th tears, the cryed out, good God! dear Sifter do not go ! Thefe words ftrook a great fear into me, which the Queen my Mother did perceive, and calling my Sifter to her was very angry with her, and forbad her to tell me any thing: My Sifter replyed, there appeared no reason, that my life should be thus made a Sacrifice, and that without donbr if they discovered any thing, they would revenge themselves on me. The Queen my Mother answered, that if it pleased God I should receive no hurt, but howloever it fellour. That needs be gone, for fearmy ablence flould give occasion of suspecting any thing. I faw very well they were in ear-nest disputation, but I did not understand their words, when again file comman ded ded me very roundly to go to bed. My Si-ther weeping, bad me good night, not da-ring to tell me any thing, and I went away as a thing loft in amazements, and infears. As soone as I came into my closet, I be-Almightie God, that he would be pleated to take me into his protection , and to defend me, not knowing from what, or whom: By and by the King my husband who was in bed, defired me that I would haffen to him, which I did, and found his bed encompassed with thirty or forty Huguenors, which till then I not observed, for but a few daies were paffed, fince I was married to him, they did nothing elfe but talke of the Accident that befell Monheur the Admirall, refolving as foon asir was day to demand justice of the King on Monfieur de Guife, and if the King would refule to right them, they would then right All that night my fifters themselves. teares were loaking into my heart, and I could not fleep for the apprehension into which the had put me, not knowing whom o feare : The night in this manner paffed away without thutting of my eyes, About the break ofday, the King my husband faid, that he would goe play a game at Tennis, attending till King Charles were stirring, resolving with all speed to demand justice of him, he went out of his chamber, and all his Gentlemen with him; I feeing it was day, beleeving the danger which my lifter did imply was now paffed being overcome with fleepe, commanded my nurse to make fast the doore, that I might fleep without disturbance; about an houre after, I being in a found fleep, Behold a man knocking with his hands and feet at the doore, and crying out, Navarre, Navarre; My Nurle thinking is to be the King my husband, ranne prefently to the doore. It was a Gentleman named Monsieur de Teian, who had received a cut with a fword on the elbow, and a thrust with a halberd through the arme, and was purfued by foure of the Guard, who came rushing into my chamber with him. He endeavoring to fave his life, did cast himself on my bed, and I perceiving the man begin to take hold of me, did throw my felfe towards the wall, and he flung himfelf after me taking falt hold behind me. I did not know the man, and could not tell if he came thither to violate me, or whither those of the Guard would have him, or me, we both cryed out, and were both equally affrighted. At length it pleased God that Montieur de Nanfay, Cap-

Captaine of the Guard came in, who finding me in that effate, although he was rouched with compaffion, could not reframe from laughter, and very sharply reprehended those of the Guard, for Indiferection, and made them depart, giving me thelife of that poore Gentleman who tooke hold of me, whom I caused to remaine in my closer untill he was well recovered; and changing my linnen, because he had covered it with blood : Monficur de Namfay related to me all that had paffed, and affured me that the King my husband was in the chamber of the King, and that he should receive no hurt, and causing me to throw a night-gowne on me, he did leade me into the chamber of my Sifter Madame de Lorraine, whither I came rather dead then alive, and paffing through the the Presence chamber, whose doores were all open, a Gentleman called Borfe, faving himfelfe from the purfuers, was fruck through with a Halberd fome three paces from me, I fell downe on the other fide, fainting away, and thought that the same froak had run us both thorough; And being a little recovered to my ftrength, I entered into the chamber where my Sifter lay, I was no fooner there, but Monfienr de Mioffans, chiefe Gentleman to

to the King my husband, and Armagnach, chiefe groome of his chamber, came and befought me to begge their lives. I prefently made hafte, and fell on my kness before the King and the Queen my Mother, befeeching them to grant me the fuite, to which in the end they condificended.

Some five or fixe dayes after, they who had begun this game, knowing that they hadfayled in their principall defigne, not avining fo much at the Huguenote, as at the Princes of the Blood, did impatiently indureshat the King my husband, and the Prince of Conde were yet alive, and knowing that no man durk attempt against the King of Navarre, because he was my Hufband, they began to weave another web, perferading the Queen my mother, that it was necessary to disfolye the Marriage. In this refolution, being one morning at the rifing of the Queen my mother, on a day in which we were to receive the Sacrament, the took an oath of me to tell her the truth, and demanded of me if my Hufband were a man or no, tellingme, if he was not that the had then means to difamil the mariage. I befought her to believe, that Punderstood not what her demand was for I might well have answered as the Rol themen Lady, whose husband being angry with her that the never told him of his evil breath, the made answere, that she thought that every mans breath did smell as his. But I told her howsoever it was, fince she had placed me with him, it was my resolution there to stay, perceiving very well that this separation which she spake of, was only to procure a mischiese to the King my husband.

After this, we accompanyed the King of Polonia as farre as Beaumont, who forme moneths before his departure from France, having laboured by all meanes to make me forger the evill offices of his Ingraticude, and to reduce our friendship to the same perfection as it was in our younger yeers, obliged himselfe in a thoufand outher and promises at his farewell to me. 1 His departure out of France, and the Kings ficknelle, which began almost at the fame time, did rouze the spirits of the two parties of this kingdome, making diverse projects on the State, the Huguenors having at the death of the Admirall, by fealed writings obliged the King my husband, and my Brother of Alenson to revenge his death (gaining my brothers heart a little before the feast of Saint Berbolomen, with the hope to establish him in Flanders) perswaded them as the King and Queen my mother came back to France, to fleak away into Campagne, where certaine troupes should bee ready to attend them. Monfieur de Miossans, a Catholike Gentleman, having heard of this defigne fo pernicious to the King his Mafter. advertised me of it, to prevent the bad effects which might prove so prejudiciall to themselves, and to the State. I made haste immediately to the King, and the Queen my Mother , telling them that I had a certaine thing to communicate unto them. which did much concerne them and which I never would discover, unlesse they would affure me, that it should not prove burtfull to whom I named, and also provide a remedy without making (how of knowing any thing. I told them then, that the next morning my Brother and the King my husband intended to joyne with fome troupes of Huguenous which came to feek them by reason of the oath and obligation for revenge, which the Huguenots had made at the Admiralls death, which obligation, being for their fathers flaughter, was now excufable by their children. I befought them to pardon my brother, and the King my Hufband antico hinder their departure without making it apparent wherefore it was done; this they accorded to, and it was carried with to much wifedome and dexcericie, that without the knowledge of the cause, they had not the means to escape. This being palled, we arrived at Saint Gamans, where we stayed a long time by reston of the Kings fickness, during which time, my Brother of Alenson laboured by all fuire and fervices to render himselfe so agreeable unto me, that in the and I vowed him friendship, as I had done before unto King Charles, for till that time, because he had alwayes his education out of Court; we had fearce the know. ledge of each certar, and therefore could not be familiar. In the end perceiving my telfe invited by flich obsequiousnesse, by so friany observances, and protestations which he daily did expresse, I did resolve to imbrace his love, and to be mindfull of all good offices that might concerne him, neertheleffe with this caution that it should be without prejudice to the dary which I owed to King Charles my Brother, whom I honored sove all things in the world; he concluded this his affection to me, having withefled it with porleverance to his carried with fo much violence, that he

The codiffrust swere carried with fo much violence, that she Lords Marshals also de Mantmaraney and de de Coffe, were retained prisoners at Bin Waicemer, and la Mole and the Count of whim were put to death; may to fuch dwestremey and height of perfect danger heaffayres were brought, that the Com-Millaries of the Court of Parliament were deplaced to hear my Brother and the King my Huband, who were both settrained of their liberry. After this dilaster fatall to France and me, we went to Lymn to meet the King of Polonist, who still possessed by le Guast, rendered of the same causes the same effects and believing the advice of that pernicious Spirit which he had lest in France to maintain and make good his part, he conceived an extream jealousic against my Brother of Alensas, suspecting and impatiently bearing the Union betwixs my Husband the king and him, and believing that I was the only chain that united and preserved their love; and therefore contrived as his aptest and most expedient course, on the one fide to traduce and fer me at diffance with the King my Husband, and on the other to procure that the Lady de Sauva to whom they both were fervants should handle them in such a manner, that the one might grow extreamly jealous of the other. This abhominable plot the fountain and beginning of fo many Croffes and Afflictions which my Brother and I have fince endured, was purfued with as much heat and fubtilty, as it was with wickednesse contrived. Some are of opinion that God hath an extraordinary and particular proteaion of Illustrious personages, and into those spirits where the raies of his excellence doe more brightly thine, he gives them by their good Angels some secret advertisements of the accidents which are prepared for them, be they good or evill; in which number I may juftly place the Queen my Mother, who hath proved mamy examples of it. The very night before that inaufpleions turnament, the dreamed that the faw the King my Father wounded in the eye ; as the next day he was, and being awaked, the often times befought him that he would not tilt that day, but content himself with the pleasure of seeing the Turnaments without being an Actor in them, Queene Margaret.

My Sonne hath the victory; Omy God, my God affift my Sonne, he now is fallen on the earth; See where the Prince of Conde lyes flain under yonder hedge: those that were then present cryed out she raved, and knowing that my Brother of Anjon was about to joyn in battel with the enemy, they thought that the had nothing but the Battell in her head, but the night following Monsieur de Losses brought news of it, as a defired meffage, by which he thought to merit much, to whom she said, you have done me wrong to waken me for that which I knew before, for faid the, Did I not fee it yesterday? then they understood, that it was not the raving of her feaver, but a particular prenotion which God doth give to rare and Illustrious persons. The Histories doe furnish us with many like examples of the ancient Heathen, as the apparition of Brutus, and many more which I will not now rehearle, it being not my intention to beautifie my Memorials, but only to relate the truth and to advance them forward, that you may receive them with greater freed. Of these divine prefages I doe not account my felf worthy; neverthesse not ungratefully to conceale the graces and gifts of God which I have received, and which I ought to confesse, and E 2

My minde doth still prophetick fee, All good or bad that fals on me.

The truth whereof I proved then at the arrivall of the King of Polonia, when the Queen my Mother met him, although it were fo hot a feafon that we were even ftifled with the throng, while my Brother and the Queen my Mother were imbracing each other, and expressing their reciprocall indeerments, yet so strange a cold and univerfall a trembling in every limbe and joynt possessed me, that they who attended on me did perceive ir; I had much adoe to conceale it, when the King Having left my Mother came to fainte me. This prefage did touch me to the heart, howfoever there passed some few dayes before the King discovered his hate and badde intention which this malicious Guaft had made him to conceive against

He reported to him that ever fince the death of the King, I took in his absence the part of my Brother of Aknson, and had indeered him to the King my husband; wherefore watching an occasion to arrive at their defigne, which was to break the friendship of my Brother of Alenson & the King my Husband, by planting diffention betwixt my Husband and my felf, and by tormenting them both with jealous pangs for their common love, and Mistresse the Lady de Sanva, one afternoon the Queen my Mother being retired into her closet to make some little stay, your Cofin Madame de Nevers, Madame de Rais, Bourdeille, and Surgeres defired me that I would goe forth into the City; on this motion the young Lady de Montigny the Neece of Madame de U/ez told us that the Abbey of Saint Peters was a goodly Covent, we refolved to goe thither because the had an Aunt there, and because there was no admission for her unlesse with perfons of eminent degree; We took her with us, and as we mounted into the Charriot, although there were fix of us in number, besides Madame de Curton a Dame of honour who was alwaies with me, there was Liancourt the Kings chief Efquire, and Camillus with him, who threw themselves on the bearing staves of Torignyes charriot, where holding as fast as they could, and playing and jeafting where they fate, as they were of a sportfull and frolick difrofition, they faid, they would goe with us allo to fee those faire and religious Ladies; the company of the young Lady of Montigny, who was a meere stranger to me, and of those two who were the Kings affociates, was as I beleeve an efpeciall mercy and Providence of God to acquit me from the imputation of the infuing flander. We came to that religious house, and my charriot, which was easie to be knowne, being guilded over, the ground-worke being yellow velvet, and garnished with filver, did attend us at the doore, neere unto which place were the lodgings of many Gentlemen. While we were in the Abbey, the King going to see Quelow, who then lay fick, having with him the King my Husband, de O, and Rufun, passed by that place, and seeing my charriot empty, he turned towards the King my husband, and faid, See heere where your Queens charriot is, and heere doth Bidus lodge, I will lay a wager that the is there, and commanded Rufus, a fit instrument for fuch malice, being a friend to h Guast, to goe in, and see, who having found !

found nothing there, yet unwilling that the truth (hould hinder the Kings project, foake alowd before the King my husband. The birds were there of late, but they are now flowen; this was sufficient to administer a subject to them for discourse till they returned home. The King my hufband teltifyed in this the Goodnes of his Nature and Understanding, with which he shewed himselfe to be alwayes accompanied, and detefting in his heart this malice, did eafily discover wherefore it was done. The King made hafte to returne before me, to possesse the Queen my mother with this Invention, and to make me receive an affront; I arrived presently after he had the leifure to doe me this ill office; when the Queen my mother had spoken strangely of me before the Ladies. partly for beliefe, and partly to pleafe her Son, whom in all things she idolized. On my returne (not knowing any thing at all) as I was going downe unto my chamber, with all the troupe that accompanyed me to Saint Peters, I did meet my husband, who as foone as he beheld me, began to laugh, and faid, Goe to the Queene your mother, and I affure my selfe you will return well chafed thence. I asked him wherefore, and what the bufineffe was? Office he made answere, I will not tell you, it is sufficient that I beleeve it not, these are Inventions to fet you and me at distance, and by that means to estrange me from the freindship of Monfieur your Brother, Seeing I could learn from him nothing elfe, I repayred to the Queen my Mother, comming into the hall, I met with Monfieur de Guise, who seeing this division in our house, was nothing forry for it, well hoping himself to collect the pieces of the broken veffell, who fald to me, I waite here Madame to tell you, that the Queen hath enterrained a very uncharitable opinion of you, and related to me all the discourse, which he received from de O, who being then an entire freind of your Cofins, told it to Monsieur de Guile, to acquaint me with it. I made hafte unto the chamber of the Queen my mother, where the was not to be found, but there I met with Madame de Nemours, and all the other Princesses and Ladies, who said unto me, Good God (Madame) the Queene your mother is extreamly incenfed against you, I would advise you not to present your selfe before her. Indeed I would not, I replied, if I had done what the King hath reported of me, but being altogether innocent, it is requifite that I should speake unto unto her to acquit my felfe. I entred then into her closet, which was made only but of fingle wainfcot, fo that they might understand with ease whatsoever words were fooken; As foone as fhe did fee me. the began to vent her choler, and to fpeak whatfoever a violent and an outragious passion could deliver. I presented the truth unto her, and told her that there were ten or twelve of us in company, befeeching her to enquire, and not onely believe those who were my friends and familiar acquaintance, but Madame de Montigny, who was a stranger to me, and Liancourt, and Camillus, who depended nor but on the King; but she had no eare either for truth or reason, whether it were that the were prepoffessed with the false. hood, or whither it rather were to comply with the King her Sonne, whom with all her affection and indeavours, with all her hopes and fearesshe idolized, and ceafed not to chide and threaten me; I telling her that the King was he that raised this report, she grew into a greater choller, and would have made me believe that it was one of the Grooms of her Chambers who passing by did see me, but finding that this excuse was too groffe that I thould receive it into my beliefe, and that that I remained extreamly offended with the King, it did the more infimulate and torment her all this was heard into her Chamber being full of people; departing thence with as much indignation as can be conceived, I found in my own Chamber the King my Husband, who faid unto me, And have you not found what I told you true? and perceiving me much afflicted : torment not your felf he faid, for this Liancourt and Camillus Shall attend the King at his going to rest, and shall acquaint him with the wrong that he hath done you', and I affure my felfe, to morrow that the Queen your Mother will doe her best to make a perfect agrees ment: I replyed to him, Sir I have received in this flander too publick an affront to pardon those that did procure it, but I account all bur fight in regard of the injury they would have done, by pulling on me fo great a mischiefe, as the loffe of your love; he answered, But God be thanked that is frustrated: to which I replyed, year thanks be to God, and to your good nature, but from this evill it were requifite we should derive some benefit, which might ferve us for instruction, to have an eye to all their policies whereby they shall indeavour so work debate betwixt us mit. for !

for it is to be believed that fince the King hath begun to proceed thus farre he will not flay here, nor defift, till he hath brohen the bonds of love betwixt my Brother and your felfe; whiles I was speaking this, my Brother came, and by a new Oath I obliged them both to the continuation of their friendship, but what Oath is of Arength in love?

While we were at the Banquet, the King baving conferred with Liancourt and Camillus, and the Lady of Montign, had perceived the errour into which the malice of Rufus had caused him to fall, and being no lesse carefull to recall it then he was ready to receive it, comming to the Queen my Mother he did confesse the truth unto her, and intreated her that she would be pleased to excuse it to me, that I might not persevere an enemy against him, fearing much (because he saw I apprehended the injury) that I knew as aptly to revenge my felf, as he did to offend me. Returning from the banquer, I found the Prophecy of the King my Husband true, the Queen my Mother sent for me into her back Cabinet, which was joyning to the Kingsdwhere she told me that she had learned thetruth, and had found it to be all falles that foever the Groom ofher Cham-

The endeavoured by all meanes to take from me the opinion that it was the King, and finding it advantaged nothing, the King came presently into her Cabiner. and made me many and grand excuses, alledging that others made him believe it. and gave me all the facisfaction and demonttration of friendship that could be defired. This being paffed, having continued at Lyons a little longer, we went into Avignon, Le Guaft daring no more invent fuch impostures, and feeing by my actions that I gave no regard unto him, he took now another course by the Lady de Sauva to advance his mischelvous projects, winning her fo far, that the governed all by him, and practifing his inftructions no leffe dangerous then those of Celestina, the worked the love of my Brother and of the King my Husband (but light before and flexible, being both but very young)to fuch a height and strength, that forgetting all ambition, exercise and defigne, they minded nothing else but that Ladies fervice, and were to strongly jealous of one another, that although the was courted by Monfieur le Guife, by le Guaft, Severey and many others who were all bett er better beloved by her then themselves, yet these two Brothers neither minded nor feared any thing but the preferred acceptance and entertainment of each others fervice . And this woman the better to play her game perswaded the King my Husband that I grew jealous of her, and for that cause that I took my Brothers part: we easily believe what is told us by those we leve. He enterraineth this beliefe he estrangeth, he concealeth himself from me more then from any other, which till then he never did; for till be received this improfion he didfpeak to me alwaies as freely as to a Sifter, knowing that I was no way inclined unto jealoufy, but defired above all things his content . I feeing this which I most feared to come to passe, which was the removall of his affection from me. for till then I alwales enjoyed the freedome and fociety of his love, and knowing that diffruit which depriveth of familiarity is the beginning of hate, whether it be amongst friends or kindred, and believing befides that if I could divert the affections of my Brother from Madame de Sauva, I hould overthrow the foundatian of le Guaft his invention which he had plexied for our division a draine, Tused my best indeavour in the behalf of my brother

What can we conceale from those we love? We flaied a long time in Auignon, and a good space after this in Butgundy and Champaries as we went to Rhemes to the mariage of the King, and from thence we ganic to Paring where the affayres were corried after the old manner ; the cunning of le Guaf by this means did ftill imploy is selfe to our destruction. Being at Paris, my Brother dictake unto him Buffi , giving that refpect unto him which his valor did deserve, hery as alwayes with my Brothere and by confequence with me, my Brothenand I being for the most part continually edgether, and giving charge to allhis fervante to honor and refeet me as himself in his Gentlemen, and feryants which attended on him fulfilled this his pleasing confinand, and with such subjecti-9th bihat they expressed no lesse service to me there o hidfelfe : Your Aunt obferving this, twould rell the oftenrimes that this union between my Brother and my falf made hen remember the time of Monfrur de Orkevite thy Unclei land Madame Masaidy my Aunt; but Goal who was the toadstoole of the time, giving a contrary interpretation to it, imagined that Forcume now had levelled him a faire and salie way by which with more dexterity he might haften to the But of his defignes, and

and by the means of Madame de Sanois being brought ion favour with the King my Husband, he attempted by all the wayes that could be devised to perswade him that Buffi coursed me, and feeing he could not prevalle with my Husband to believe it, being his cleritly advertised by his people who were alwayes with him, of my deineanour, and that there was no apparence for any fuch inspirion , he addressed himfelfe to the King whom he found more ea. he to perfivade, as well for the little good will he did bear my Brother and my felfe. our friendship being suspected and harefull to file, as for the fearer fpleen he did owe to Buffig who having fometimes followed him, had left him now, to devote his fervice to my Brother: The acquificion of fuch a fervant as much increaled the glory of my Brother; as the envy of our Enimies, there being nothing in this age of his fex and quality like unto him in valour, reputation, grace and spirit, of whom fome have faid if we may believe the transmigration of Soules as forme Philosophers have affirmed, that without doubt the Soule of your brave Brother Hardilay animated and informed Buffi; The King being poffelt with this by le Guaft related it to the Queen my Mother, exhorting her to

to tell it to the King my Husband, attempting to put him in the same grievances as he did before at Lyons; but the feing what small apparence of truth it had, rejected it and faid , I know not what male-contents they are who abuse your fancy with such fuggestions, my Daughter is unhappy to be borne in such an age, In our time we spake free to all the world, and to all the Gentlemen that followed the King your father, Monsieur le Dampbin and Monsieur de Orleance your Uncles were ordinarily in your Aunt Margarets Chamber and in mine, and none thought strange thereat, as there was no reason why they should; Buffifeeth my Daughter before you, before her Husband in his Chamber, this is not in some retired place, or the doore being thut, Buffi is a person of quality, and chiefe in attendance on your Brother; what can you collect from this, can any man make more then a meer flander of it? Ar Lyons you made me give her so great an affront in the fame nature that I am afraid the will remember it while the liveth. The King amazed at this, replyed, Madame I fpeak not but after others, the demanded who are they my Son? they are those who labour to fow diffention betwixt you and all yours: The King being gone the repeated ted all to me, and faid, you are born in a miferable age, and calling in your Aunt Madame de Dampierre she began todifcourse with her of the honest liberty of delights which they enjoyed in their younger years, without being subject to misconstruction : La Quast seeing the Mine blown up, and that it took not fire on that fide he expected, addreffed himfelf to fome Gentlemen that followed the King my Husband, who till that time had been companions of Buffi, and were now become his enemies, by reason of the jealouse which his advancement and his glory had procured him, they joyning to their envious hatred an inconfiderate zeale-to the fervice of their Mafter, or to fpeake more truly, covering their envy with that pretence, refolved one evening (as be went late from his Mafters lying down) to retire into his own lodging to affault and feize upon him : and because my Brothers Gentlemen were accustomed to keep him company they knew they should not finde him with leffe then fifteen or twenty perfons, and although he carried no fword by reason of the wound which a little before he received in his arme, they knew his presence would be enough to double the courage of his companions: Apprehending hending this and indeavoring to make their enterprise affured, they resolved to affault him with two or three hundred men, the vaile of night covering the shame of fuch an affault : Le Guaft who commanded a Regiment of the Guard provided them with Souldiers, who putting themselves in five or fix troupes in the fireet through which of necessity he must paffe, they charged on him putting out their Links and Torches. After a volley of Harquebuses and Pistols, enough nor only to intrap a troupe of fifteen or twenty persons, but to defeate a whole Regiment of Souldiers, they hand to hand did combat with this troupe, labouring continually in the mask of night to mark out Buffi, knowing him by his dove-coloured Scarfe in which he carried his wounded arme, which ferved at that time well for them, who otherwise would have felt the Arength and vigour of it, but they were to well entertained by those few honest Gentlemen from whom neither this unexpected incounter, nor the horrour of the night had taken away their indgement, or their courage, that making as great a proofe of their valouras of their affection, to their friend, by fine force they brought him to his lodging, without lofing any of their troupe, laving one Gentleman only who was trained up with him, and be ing woundedalfoin his arme carried it in a dove-coloured Karfe as Buffi did, yet differing much from his, it being nothing fo rich as his Masters was, howfoever in the obscurity of night either the fury of the courage of these affassinates, who had the word given them to fall on the dove-coloured scarfe, prevailed so much, that all the troupes threw themselves on that poore Gentleman and left him dead in the street. An Italian Gentleman that belonged to my Brother being there, furprised with feare did runne all bloody into the Louure and comming up the staires where my Brothers Chamber was, cryed out that Buffi was affaulted; my Brother immediately would have gone to rescue him : By good fortune I was not then in bed, and was lodged to neer unto my Brother that I heard that affrighted man comming up thestaires, and Proclayming that terrible news as foon as he. I ran forthwith into his Chamber to hinder him from going down, and fent to the Queen my Mother to intreate her to come and flay him, fceing the just griefe which he conceived did transport him so beyond himselfe, that inconsiderately be would expose himselfe to any danger to run headlong to revenge: we retained him with much adoe; the O. my Mother urging there was no apparence that he thould venter himfelf alone during night, that obscurity did cover all vilany, that k Guast was mischievousenough to have done it peradventure on purpose that he might fall into some evill. accident. These words were of little force with him being almost desperate, but the using her authority staied him and gave the Porters charge that they should not let him forth, taking the pains herfelf to flay with him till he had learned the truth of all: Buffi whom God had preferved miraculously from that danger troubling not himfelf with the hazard of it his Soule being uncapable of feare, being born for a terrour to his Enemies, a glory to his Mafter, a helpe unto his friends; as soon as he was entred into his lodging thinking in what a trouble his Mafter would be if the newes of this encounter were brought uncertainly unto him, and fearing it might throw him upon the ranks of his enemies, as without doubt it had, if the Queen my Mother had not prevented it, fent forthwith one of his fervants who brought him the truth and the news of all; And the day appearing, Buffi

Buffi without fear of his enemies came into the Louure with as joyfull and as brave a presence, as if the tormer assassing had been to him a turnament of pleasure, My Brother being also as glad to see him, as full of indignation to revenge his quarrell, sufficiently did witnesse how sensible he was of the affront that was done unto him by attempting to deprive him of so worthy and so brave a Servant although the Guast could not endure that Buffi should be ranckt before him, or be seen to take the upper hand.

The Queen my Mother the wifest and molt advised that ever was, knowing of what weights were such effects, and forefeeing that in the end, they might fet both her sonnes at variance, did counsaile my Brother (to take away all pretences) that Buffi a while should absent himself from Court, to which my Brother gave confent, through my intreaties, feeing well that if he stayed, Le Guast would continue his incendiary devices, and would make him ferve as a Cloake for his pernicious defignes, which were to keep at discord my Brother and the King my Husband as he had done by his aforefaid inventions who had no other will but that of his Masters, departed from the Court accompanied with the bravest of the Nobility which followed my Brother; this Subject was pleasing to Le Guaft, and at the same time seeing the King my Husband one night in a great weaknesse in which he fainting swounded oftentimes. away, which came unto him as I beleeve by an excesse which he had made with women, where I ferved and affifted him as my duty did command me, at which fo much he was contented, that he praifed me to all the world, faying that if I had not perceived him in that extreamity, and run presently to his succour to call my women and his fervants to him, that he had been dead, and for this that he would make farre more deerly of me then hitherto he had. Le Guaft feeing also that of late the love and friendship between my Brother and the King my Husband began to renew it felf, believing that I was the only occasion and instrument thereof, and that I was to them (as we may fee in all natural) things, but especially in Serpents cut) a certain naturall balme which doth reunite and reconcile the divided parts, purfuing alwayes the course of his first pernicious defigne, and labouring to contrive some new invention to divide the King my Husband and my felf; did put into the

led unto destruction, by estranging himselfe and his affections from my Brother, and my selfe, from whom he ought to expect his greatest succour, and growing now into neglect, as the King began to undervalue him, they caused him to speak unto my Brother, who since the departure of Bussi had no way amended his condition; for every day Le Guaft canfed him to receive fome new indignities, and knowing that they were both in the same condition at Court, being both out of favour, and that Le Guaft alone did govern the world, that they must begge to him for whatsever they defired to obtain of the King; and if they chanced to demand any thing they were rejected with contempt, that if any one had made himself their servant, he forthwith was cryed down, and laden with a thouland flanders and complaints, perceiving also that their disunion was their ruine, they resolved to unite and retire themselves from Court, and to affemble their fervants and friends together, to demand of the King a condition and respect worthy of them, my Brother having not yet the exhibition for his maintenance, and maintaining himfelf on certain ill affigued penfions which came unto him onely when it pleased Le Guaft, and the King my Husband no way rejoycing in his government of Guyenne, he being not permitted to go unto it, or to any other of his Principa-This resolution being taken, my Brother spake unto me and faid that they two were now made perfect friends, and that he much defired that the King my HusHusband and I should be the like, and intreated me to forget whatfoever before had paffed betwire us, adding that the King my Husband told him that he was beartily forry for it, and now perceived that our enemies were too frong and fubile for us, that he was refolved now entireto affect me, and to grant unto me all defired fatisfaction, he befought me also hat for my part I would love him, and in his absence affish him in his affaires; they both agree on this resolution, that my Brother should depart first, sealing away in a Caroach, and that certain dayes after he King my Husband should follow him under pretence of going to the Chace, being both very forry that they could not take me with them, neverthelelle affuring themelves, it being known they were abroad, that none durft offer any violence to me, intending to make it speedily appeare, that their intention was no way to trouble France, but only to establish a condition worthy of their quality, and to fecure their perfons, for among thefe late troubles they alledged; that they were not without great danger of their lives whether this feare of theirs were well grounded orno, or whether they who defired the ruine and division of our house IRC 1

House the better to prevaile themselves had cansed such alarmes to be given them, by the daily advertisements they received.

The Evening being come, a little beforethe supper of the King was ferved in. my Brother changing his cloake, and muffling it about his face, went forth attended only with one Servant, who was not known, and walked on foot as farre as Saint Honorius gate, where he found himselfe provided with a Caroach which he borrowed of a Lady for that purpose, into which being mounted, he came as farre as certaine houses about a quarter of a mile from Paris, where having horses that artended him, he there planted himself in the Saddle, and about a mile from thence, hee was faluted by two or three hundred horse of his fervants, who made there their Rendezvous accordingly, as he appointed; they perceived not at Court his departure, till about nine of the clock in the evening; the King and Queen my mother demanded of me why he was not at supper with them, and if he were in health or no I replyed, that I faw him not fince dinner, they fent into his chamber to know what the bufineffe was, forthwith it was returned that he was not there, they gave order that that they should fearch all the chambers of the Ladies to which he was accustomed to goe, they fought him in the Castle, and in. and round about the Citie, but they found him not a Immediately the Alarme waxed hor, the King grew into a rage, and swolne with choler and despite, he sent to all the Princes and Lords of the Court, commanding them to take horfe, and to bring him back either alive or dead, urging that he was gone to trouble his estate, and to make warre against him, and that he would make him understand the folly he committed in opposing a Prince To puiffant as himselfe. Many of the Princes and Lords refused this commission, demonftrating unto the King, of what imporrance it was, and that they would ingage their lives in the service of his Majeflie, as their duties did oblige them, but to goe against Monsieur his Brother, they well knew that the day would come, when his Majestie would give them but little thanks for it, and affured him that my Brother would undertake nothing that might be displeasing to his Majestie, or prejudicial to the State, that peradventure it was some discontent that invited him to remove from Court, and thereupon it were expedient that the King should first first fend unto him to informe himfelfe of the occasion that moved him to depart, before he took a refolution to proceed against him with so extreames rigour; but others there were that accepted this commillion, and prepared themselves to take horfe, their diligence could not make that dispatch, but it was first upon the break of day, which was the cause that they could not finde my brother, and were confinained to roturne, as being not in equipage of warres The King for all this was not more favourable to the King my husband, but looked with the lame eye of distegard upon him as before, the which confirmed him in his refolation, fo that within a few dates after, he retired himself from Court, prefending that he was gone on hunting. For me, the teares which (all that night after my Brothers departure) were my companions, had brought on the next morning forgreat a Rewme on one fide of my face, that by reason of a fever, I was confirmined cereain daies to keep my bed, being very ill, and overcome with many forrows, daving which time of ficknesse, the King my husband, whether he was bufied to prepare for his departure, or whetherbeing about to leave the Court, he would bellow on pleasure the little time he

he had so flay, and delight himself with the prefence and company of his Mittris Madame de Sauve, had not the leifure to vifiteme, but retiring to his reft at his accuflomed houres, which were about one or two a clock after mid-night, I knew not of his comming, we lying in two beds, as our usuall manner was, and riling before I was awake to be at the rifing of the Queen my mother, to which as I have faid, Madame de Sanva was accustomed to goe, he not fo much as spake unto me, as he promifed my Brother, and departed in the fame manner, without bidding me farewell : For all this, I was suspected by the King to be the only cause of his departure, who was fo incenfed against me, that if he had not been retained by the Queen my mother. I beleeve his choler had wrought some crueleie against my life, but restrained by her, and daring not doe worfe, he fuddenly whifpered in my mothers eare, that it were requisite, I had a Guard fet over me; to keep me from following the King my husband, and to debar any from comming to me, that I might not advertife my Brother and him of the occurren-The Opene my Mother ces at Court. willing to doe all things with elemency, sold him, that the beld it do to be very necessary, being very glad that she had rebated a little the first edge and fury of his Choler, but faid withall, that the would goe and prepare me to endure my bondage with patience, alleaging that those grievances would not allwayes continue in the same termes, that all things in this world had two faces, that the first which was darke and frightfull, being turned, when we should come to behold the fecond more fweet and fmiling, that on those new events, wee would take new counsells, that then peradventure he might have need of my fervice, that as wisedome did advise him to live with his friends, as chancing one day to prove his enemies, and therefore not too much to truft them, fo friendship diffolving, and being of power to hurt, the same wifedome did counsell him to use his enemies, as chancing one day to prove his friends.

These demonstrances withheld the King from doing me any hurt, to which he had a great desire, but le Guast assisted him with an Invention to discharge his choler another way, and caused him (to doe me the greatest displeasure in the world) to send some swordmen to the house of Chastelas the Cosm of Torigny, and under presence of bringing her to the King to drown her in the river that was neere unto his house; they being arrived, Chaftelet gave them free admission into his house, not doubting any thing; they feeing her, the ftrongeft of them using as much indifcretion as violence in the ruinous charge which was committed to them, took hold of Torigny, and binding her, did lock her in a chamber till their horses were bayted; in the mean time, behaving themselves after the French manner, not regarding what might happen, they crammed themselves up to the very throates with the best provision that the house afforded. Chastelas, who was a discreet man, not caring at all if by the expence of his victualls, he could gain any time to deferre the departure of his Cofin, hoping that who hath time, hath life, and that God might change the Kings heart, and countermand those people to defift from fo great a cruelty, durft not enterprise by any other way to hinder them, though he had freinds and means enough, but God who alway looked on my affliction, to deliver me from the danger and indignities which my enemies procured me, prepared an unexpected fuccour to refcue Torigny, which was this; Certain groomes and Chamberlaines having fled for feare of these speylers, who kept a knocking and a bouncing within, as in a house of pillage, being gone fome quarter of a mile from the tionle, God guided that way, Is Forte and Avantigny with their troupes, who were about two hundred horse, and were now going to joyne themselves to the Body of my Brothers army, and it happened that amongst the troupes of Penfants, La Ferre beheld a Servant of Chaftelar, with an afflicted and delefull commenance, and knowing him, asked if there were any Souldiers, who passing by that way, had done his mafter wrong, the groome answered no, and that the cause which fo tormented him, was the extreamity in which he left his Mafter, for the violence offered to his Cofing Immediately La Ferie and Avantigny telolved to doe me that good office, to deliver Torigny, prayling God, that gave them to good an occasion to witnesse their service and affe-Etion to me, and galloping in full fpeed, they and all their troupes arrived fo apely at Chaftelin his house, that they found these rade fellows on the point of putting Torigin on a horfe, to leade her out to drowne her; the Horimen committee all into the Court with their Swords drawne. cryed our, Forbeare you Villaines, if you you doe be any violence, you are but dead I and charging on them, they did fly away, leaving their prisoner transported new with joy, as before with fear, and having thanked God and them for this so needfull a deliverance, the caused the Charriot of her Cosin Chasteler to be made ready, and accompanied with him, were with this guard of honest men to find my Brother, who was very glad being not able to have me with him, to have there one whom so intirely I affected.

While the King made this goodly difpatch to facrifice Torigny to his anger, the Queen my Mother who knew nothing of it came into my Chamber to vifice me as I was then making my felfe ready, determining with my felfe, though I was troubled with the rhewme, yet more fick in minde then body by reason of the afflictions which possessed me, to go that day abroad to fee a little the course of the world on these new accidents, being alwayer in feare leaft they thould enterprife any thing against my Brother and the King my Husband , My Mother faid unto me, Daughter you need not make fuch hafte to dreffe you, grieve not I pray at what I shall deliver, I affure my felfe that that you doe not think it strange that the King findes himselfe offended with your Brother and your Husband, and knowing the friendship that is between you, believing that you knew of their departure he is resolved to keep you as a hostage of them; he knows how your Husband loves you, and that he cannot have a better gage of him than you, for this cause he hath commanded that a Guard thould be fet over you, to hinder you that you fhould not firre from your Chamber: His Counfell also hath represented to him, that if you were at freedome amongst us, you would discover what soever is intended against your Brother and your Husband, and acquaint them with it. I defire you not to grow impatient at this restraint, it shall not God willing last long, grieve not your felfe that I dare not come unto you as often as I would, for I am afraid to give sulpition to the King, but affure your felfe I will not permit that any violence shall be done unto you, and I will labour to the uttermod of my power to conclude a peace f r the reconcilement of your Brothers. I represented to her how great was the injury that in this I did receive; I would nordefly but that my Brother did alwaies

communicate to me his just discontents, but for the King my Husband, fince Torigny was taken from me, we had not fo much as talked together, that he came not to vifite me in my ficknesse, nor yet did fo much as bid meradieu when he went away: the replyed these be ordinary complaints between a Husband and a Wife, but I know that with kinde words and letters he will regain your heart, and if he should send you word to come unto him, that you would goe, to which the King my Sonne will no way give consent. She returning I remained certain moneths in that estate, having not any, not so much as my familiar and most private friends that came to fee me, for feare of the Kings difpleasure. At Court adversity is alwayes alone, as prosperity is accompanied, and persecution is seldome any where affisted with true and conftant friends; only the brave Grillon was he who despising all prohibitions came five or fix times into Chamber so aftonishing and frighting the Cerberuffes that were fet to guard my my doore, that they durft neither grant, nor deny him entrance: During this time the King my Husband being arrived in his government, and having affembled his friends and fervants they did demonstrate unto unto him what an unkindnesse and in it he committed in not taking his leave of me, nor in so much as hidding me farewell ar hisdeparture, telling him shat I had understanding enough to dor him fervice, and that it was needfull to regain me, that he should receive much profit by my lowrand by my prefence, if things being reconciled, be could have me with him. He was eafie to be perswaded to this, being removed from that Giece Madame de Sauva vehole charme had loft their force by her absence, which in her presence rendred him without reason to apprehend the policies of our adverfaries. and that the separation and division betwixt us was as prejudiciall to himfelfe as unto me : he wrote unto me a very honest letter in which be defired me to forget whatfoever had paffed betwixt us, and to believe that for the time to come he intirely would affect me, which he would make more apparent to me then heretofore he had done, commanding me to advertife him of the passages of the Courtaffaires, and of my own effate, and of my Brothers, for though they were friends, they were removed from intelligence, my Brother being in Champagne and the King my Husband in Gafany , I received that letter letter being yet a Captive which brought much comfore to me, and I failed not afterwards (although the Guard were commanded that I thould not be fuffered to write) being aided with necessity the Mother of invention, to fend oftentimes my letters to him.

Certain dayes after my reftraint, my Brother knew of my captivity, which did to much incense him, that had he not planted in his heart as great an affection to his Councry, as he had a part and interest in the State; he had made fo cruell a war. se he had then the means, commanding a brave army, that the people had endnred the punishment for the errour of their Prince, but retained by that naturall obligation and affection, hee wrote to the Queen my Mother, that if they used me to ungently they would throw him into the bottome of despaire, the fearing to fee the occasion of this warre brought to fuch an extreamiry, that the knew not how to pacific it , repreferred to the King of what importance it was, and found him disposed to receive her reasons, his anger being qualified by the knowledge of the danger wherein he was, being felsed on in Languedock, Gafregny , Dauphine , and Poiston by the King my my Husband, and the Huguenots, who held many goodly Towns and fores ; and by my Brother in Champagne who had a great army composed of the bravest of the nobility in France, and fince this departure of my Brother, being himselfe not able either by perfwasions, threatnings. or commands, to make any take horse or to oppose my Brother, all the Princes and Lords of France providently forbearing to put their finger betwixt two grinding Militones; All this confidered, the King gave open eare to the Declaration of the Queen my Mother, and was as desirous as her selfe to have a Peace established, intreating her that the would be pleafed to be a means thereof. She presently prepared her self to goe unto my Brother demonstrating unto the King that it was neceffary to take me with her , but the King would not con ent unto it, believing that I did serve him as, a sufficient hostage, thereupon the took her journy without and without so much as speaking to me, when my Brother feeing that I was nor with her, represented the just discontents which he received, and the indignities and rough usage which he found at Court, adding thereunto the injuries which were done to me by keeping me in durance durance, and the cruelty which to difplease me they more then offered to Torigny, protesting that he would lend no eare to any overture of peace untill the wrongs which they had done me were redreffed, and till he faw me fatisfied, and free. The Queen my Mother hearing this, returned, and declared to the King what answer my Brother sent unto him, and that it were requifite if he defired a peace that the should go back again, but for her to goe without me, her journey would be fo unprofitable, that it would rather increase, then mitigate the Evill, as also to take me with her, without having first contented me, it might doe more hurr then good, and that it was to be feared that I would return no more, but from thence would repaire to the King my Husband, that it was necessary to take away the guard that was fet over me, and to finde a means to make me forget the rough usage which I received. This the King found good, and feemed as much affected to it as her felfe. Immediately the fent for me, and told me that the had prevailed fo much, that she had prepared things to a way of peace, that she knew that my Brother and my felf did ever defire the benefit of the State, that the could conclude a peace so advantagious to my Brother that he fould have occasion to reft binfelf content, and befree from the tyrany of Le Gueft, or whatforver other malicious Spirit did poffeste the King a gainfthim, and sharif I would affift berin making the accordance betwiet the King and my Brother, I thould deliver her from a great and insupportable calamity, thee being unable without a griefe as Arong as death to receive the sidings of the Victory of the one or other of her fonnes the defired me that the injurice I received might not transport me mather to thoughts of vengeance, then of peace, the told methat the King was forex that the had feen him weep, and that he would give me fuch fatisfection, that I should remaine contented with it : Lreplyed to her that I never would preferre my private Good to the Benefit of the State, for the improvement and fafety whereof I would willingly facrifice my life, and that I defired nothing more then a happy peace, to the effecting whereof, I would devote my felf, and all my indeavon; on this, the King came into her cabinet, and with a multitude of faire words did labour to give me fatisfaction, and inclied me to his friend hip, finding that neither er my deportment, nor my words gave himany apparence of the injuries I seccired, which I did more in contempt of de offence chet he had done unto me, then forang facisfaction to him, having paffed the time of my captivity in the pleasure und exercise of reading , in which I then beganto delighemy felf, owing this obliscionact to Fortune, but to the divine Providence, which then began to provide no fo great a remedy to relieve my felf in she allictions which were prepared for me, which ferved me also us an introdu-Mion to devotion, reading in that fayre and univerfall booke of Nature, fo many wonders of the creator of it; for every well compered Soul rearing coit felf a ladder by this knowledge, of which GoD is the left and highest round, revished thereat detheddrelle himelf to the adoration of che admirable light of that incomprehonfible Effence, and making a perfect decle, delighteth not in any thing but to follow that Homerick chaine, that exqui-See Ring of Knowledge which proceedesh from God himselfe, the beginning and end of all things; And fadnesse, conconfidencer own actions, rouseshup the Soul in isself, which uniting all her forces to reject the evill, and to imbrace the good, thinkes, and thinkes agains inceffantly to choose this Soveraigne bliffe, in which we may finde peace with confidence, and these are those pious dispositionsthat prepare us to arrive at the know. tedge and the love of God. I received these two benefits from the folitude and griefe of my captivity, to addict my felfe to reading and devotion, of which, before I scarce had tasted, amidst the vanity and pompe of my profeerous Fortune. The King as I have faid, feeing in me no apparence of discontent, told me that the Queen my mother should return unto my Brother in Champagne, to mediate a peace, and befought me to accompany her, and to doe there all the good offices I could, for he knew (he faid) that my Brother repoled more trult in me, then in any other in the world, and that whatfoever Good should arise from thence, he would give me the honour of it, and professe himselfe obliged to me; I promised him what I refolved to performe, for it conduced to the Benefit of my Brother, and the State. fo to imply my felf, as he by it should receive contentment. The Queen my mother did depart, and I with her, and comming to Sens, the conference was held in

2 Gentlemans house a mile from thence. The morning following, wee came to the place of conference, my Brother was there in person, accompanyed with some of his owne troupes, and with the principall Lords and Catholike Princes of his Army among whom also was Duke Casimire, and Colonell Poux, who brought unto him fixe thousand Reisters, by the means of those of the Religion, who were joybed with my Brother in the behalfe of the King my Husband. For many dayes they treated on the peace, and the conditions of it, having many disputations on the articles especially on those which concerned the Huguenots, and the agreement was made with conditions more advantagious to them, then they themselves could with, as presently after it appeared. The Queen my mother, the peace being concluded, perswaded my Brother to send back the Reifters, and to retire himselfe from those, from whom (being ever a good Carholick) he had a great defire to separate himselfe, not willing to be served by Huguenote, but only for necessitie. In this peace, there was an Estate affured to my brother for his maintenance according to his qualitie, in which my Brother would have me comprised, being H

dowryin Lands might be established, and Monsteir de Beauvais, who was deputed there aparty forhim, insisted on it very strongly, but the Queen my Mother did intreate me that I would not give way into it, and assured them, that I should receive of the King what I would demand, on which I did request them, that they would not comprehend me in the Articles, and that what soever I had conferred on me, I had rather receive it from the grace and bounty of the King and Queen my mother, believing that it would be a course more beneficiall, and as affured to me.

The peace concluded, and affurance taken on the one fide, and on the other, the Queen my mother preparing her felfe for her returne, I received letters from the King my Husband, by which I understood that he had a great defire to fee me, intreating me, that as foone as I faw the peace concluded, to fue for leave to come unto him: I befought the Queen my mother, who rejected my petition, and by all means possible indeavored to divert me from it, saying, That when I received not her proposition to disanull our marriage, after the massacre of S. Bartbolamen, the then commended my retolution, because my husband was made a Catholick, but now, fince he hath abandoned the Catholick Religion, and is turned Huguenot, the could not permit that I should goe unto him, and feeing I daily renewed my petition, the told me with teares in her eyes, that if I returned not with her, the thould for ever loofe her credit with the King, adding that the King would beleeve that the had taken me with her for that intent. and that the had made a folemn promife to him to bring the back, the defired me to flay till my Brothers return, which the faid hould be with speed, and that fiddainly after , the would take order for my dispatch to the King my Husband?

Some few dayes after, we returned to the King to Paris, who by reason of the peace, received us with great joy, yet not well liking the advantageous conditions of the Huguenots, and determining with himselfe, as soon as he had got my Brother to Court, to finde some new Invention to begin the war again, and not let them joy in that to which to his grief he condiscended, to withdraw my brother from them, who stayed yet behind a moneth or two, to give order for sending backe the Reisters, and for the dismissing of his army, He arrived not long after at Court, with all the Catholick Nobilitie that affilled him; the King received him with all honour, feeming to have great joy to fee him there, and he made very much of Buffi also, who came with him, for Le Gueff was lately dead, being flaine by the judgement of God, as he was in course of phyfick the had a body infected with all fort of villanies, and fubject to a corruption, which a long time did poffeffe it, as the Deville did his foule, to whom he did hot mage by Magick, and all fort of wickedneffe; this Brand of fire and divition being taken from the world and the King having his thoughts beat only on the ruine of the Huguenots, intended to make use of my Brother to command against them, to render my brother and them unreconcileable, and fearing also that to prevent it, I would haften to the King my husband; he entertaind us both, as well the one, as the other, with all the pleasures that the Court could yeeld, to make our hay there more delightfull; and feeing at the fame time that Monfieur de Duras was fent from the King my husband to demand me, and with fo much importunity I urged to be gone, that he no longer could denie me, he told told me (shewing first it was the love he did beare unto me, and then the know-ledg what a Grace & ornament I brought unto his Court, which caused him so long to suspend my journey) that he would now conduct me himself as far as Poistiers, and returned Monsieur de Duras with that assurance.

Certaine daies after, he stayed at Paris, deferring, and not openly refufing to give me leave to goe, till he had all things in readineffe for the declaration of his defigned warre against the Huguenots, and by confequence against the King my Hufband, and to give a pretence unto it, they caused a rumour to be spread, that the Catholicks complained of the advantageous conditions, to which they accorded with the Huguenots at the peace of Sens. This murmur and discontent of the Catholicks was blowne abroad, that they came to League and unite themselves at Court from all the Cities and Provinces of the Kingdome, enrouling, and figning themselves, and making a great noise (but privately with the Kings confent) that they would choose Monsieur de Guise for Chiefe; there was no other thing spoken of from Paris untill you come to Bleis, where the King had called the States to-H 3 gether, gether, during the overture of whom, the King called my Brother into his cabinet with the Queen my mother, and some of the Lords of his counfell, and presented there unto him, of what importance for his Authoritie and estate was this league, which the Catholicks had begun, especially if they should come to make themselves heads, and to choose those of the House of Guize; that it concerned them (understanding my brother and himself) more then all the rest, that the Catholicks had reason to complain, and that his duty and confcience did oblige him to discontent the Huguenots rather then the Catholicks, he intreated and conjured my Brother, as an heire of France, and a true Catholick, that he would counfell and affift him in this affayre, whereon the hazard of his Crowne, and the Catholick Religion so much depended, adding that it seemed to him to cut off all danger that this League might bring, that he himself ought to make the chiefe, and both to shew his zeal to his Religion, and to debarre them from choosing any other, to signe himself first as Chiefe, and then to have my Brother figne, and afterwards all the Princes, Lords and Governours, and whofoever had any charge or power in his Kingdome.

dome. My Brother could not but offer that fervice which he owed to his Maieflie, and to the prefervation of the Catholick Religion. The King having taken affurance of my Brothers affiftance, which was the principall end to which the artifice of the League did tend, did fuddenly call all the Princes and Lords together. and caufing the roll of the faid League to be brought unto him, he first there figned himself as Chiefe, and then my Brother, and after him all the rest, who had not yet figned. The morning following, they opened the Estates, having taken advice of the three Lord Bishops of Lions, of Ambrum, and of Vienne, who perswaded him that after the oath made at his confecration no oath made unto the Hereticks could be of power, the faid oath nullifying all other oathes and promises which he could make unto the Huguenots: this being pronounced at the opening of the States, and warre being proclaimed against the Huguenots, the King sent back Genislae, who had been there to hasten my departure, with rough and threatning language:telling him that he gave his fifter to a Catholick, and not unto a Huguenot, and if that the King my husband had a defire to have me, he should turne Catho-lick againe; all preparations for the warre were made, there nothing elfe was fooken of at Court, and to render my brother more unreconcileable with the Huguenots, the King made him Chiefe of one of his Armies. Geni flac being come to tell me this fad farewell, which the King had given him, I tepayred prefently to the closet of the Queen my mother, where I found the King, and complained how he had abused me with delayes, having alwayes hindered me from going to the King my husband, and now diffembled to depart from Paris, to conduct me to Poictiers, to expresse an effect fo contrary. I represented to him, that I was not married for pleasure, or to satisfie my owne defires, but that it was the defire of King Charles, conjoyned with my mothers, and his owne, that fince they had given me to him, they could not hinder me from running my fortune with him, that I would goe unto him, and if they refuled to give the leave, I would fleale away in what disguise and fashion that I could, though with the hazard of my life. The King answered, 'Tis not now a time (my Sifler) to importune me for leave, and I professe the truth which you have faid that I have deferred your going for a while, to denie denie is in the end for altogether; for fince he King of Navarre hath turned again to we a Huguenot, I never thought it good that you should goe anto him; that which we have done, the Queen my mother, and my felf, is for your fafetie. I will make warre against the Huguenots, and root one that Religion, which doth us fo much mischief, and there is not the least apparence of reason why you, who are a Catholick, and my fifter, should be in their hands as an hostage of me, and who knows not, but to procure unto me an irreparable loffe, they may revenge themselves on your life for the evill which I shall bring upon them; no, no, you shall not goe, and if you feale away, as you fay you will, understand that you shall have me and the Queen your Mother for your cruell enemies, and you shall feel our anger to the uttermost of our power, and shall rather impayre, then amend the condition of your husband. I retired my felf with great displeasure from that cruell sentence, and taking the advice of the principall of my friends at Court, they declared, that it would ill become me to be refident in a Court fo contrary to the king my husband, and from whence fo openly they made warre against him, and counfelled felled me, as long as the warres continued, to retire my felfe from Court, and were it possible, it were more honourable for me to finde some pretence to goe out of the kingdome, under the colour of pilgrimage, or to vifite fome of my kindred; Madame de Roche-fur-yon was one of those whom I affembled to defire their counsell. who was then upon her departure to goe to the waters of Span. My brother was also present, and had brought Mondoncet with him, who was Agent for the King in Flanders, and being lately returned, reprefented to the King, with what griefe the Flemmings suffered the usurpation which the Spaniards made on the Lawes of France, for the dominion, and foveraignty of Flanders; that many of the Lords and Commons of their cities had expresly commanded him to acquaint his Majestie how much they flood addicted to the French, and that they would lend him all their helping hands. Mondoncet, feeing the King gave no eare to his advise, having nothing in his head, but the Huguenots, who were now to feele the yengeance of his displeasure, for affishing my brother against him, talked no more unto him of it, but addressed himself unto my Brother, who having the true pature of a Prince, loved onely to enterprise great and glorious things, being borne rather to conquer, then preferve; he suddenly imbraced the enterprise, which pleased him so much the more, because he perceived nothing of injustice in it, willing to regain that unto France, which was usurped by the Spaniards; Mondoucet for this cause became my Brothers fervant, who fent him back to Flanders under the colour of accompanying Madame the Princesse of Rocke-fur-you to the waters of Span, and he observing that, during these warres, every one fought a faire pretence to withdraw me from France, whether it were into Savoy, or into Lorrayne, or to Saint Claudes, or to our Lady of Loretto, whispered these words into my brothers care, Sir, if the Queen of Navarre could pretend any malady, which the waters of Span, whither Madame the Princeffe of Roche-fur-you is now going, might ferve for cure, this would fall out very fortunately for you: my brother much commended his counfell, and being very glad of the discovery of it, suddenly cryed out, My deer Queen, fludy no more, for you must goe to the waters of Span, whether Madame the Princesse is going : I have sometimes heard you complain of a fwelling in your arme arme, you are to fay that your Physicians did then prescribe it, but the season was not fitting but now the time is feafonable, and you must intreat the King to give you leave to goe. My Brother declared not himself at that time, wherefore he defired the journey, because that Monfieur the Cardinall of Burben was then in company, whom he suspected for a Guisian. and inclined to the Spanish faction. For my felfe, I understood it very well, not doubting but it reflected on his enterprife for Flanders, of the which Mondonest had spoken to us both. All the company were of this advise, and Madame the Princeffe of Roche-fur-yon, who her selfe was going thither, and who loved me intirely, with great joy did apprehend and entertain this counsell, and promised to goe with me to the Queen my mother, to have her grant confent unto it. On the morning following, we found the Queene alone, and I represented unto her, what a displeafure it was unto me, to fee the King my husband in a warre against the King, and to be thus removed, and kept afunder from him, that while this warre continued, it were neither expedient nor honorable for me to flay at Court, where if I ftill continued, I could not avoide one of thefe thefe two Evills, either that the King my hasband would conceive that I flayed at Court only for my owne pleasure, and that I affifted him not as I ought to doe or that the King would entertaine an opinion, that I fent daily advertisements to the King my husband, that both the one and the other would procure unto me much affliction; I befought her that the would pleased to think well of it, if for alwhile Lettranged my felf from Court, to avoid all occasions of suspition, that some time was paffed, fince the Phyfitians preferihad me the waters of Spau, for the fwelling of my arme, to which I had a long time been subject, and that the feafon of the yeers being now fitted for it, this journey by her permission would fall out opportunely, not onely to remove me from Court, but from France alfo; and fo the King my husband might understand, that being unable to be with him by reason of the Kings diffrust, I would not remaine in that place where warre was made againfthing, and that I hoped that her wifdome would fordispose of things in time, that the King my husband should obtaine a peace of the King, and necurne into his favour, that I would attend to heare that happy news to have then permission to re-

payre unto him, and that in this voyage to the Span, Madame the Princeffe of Rochefur-you (who was there prefent) would doe me the honour to accompany me. The Queene my mother did much applaude my refolution, and told me that the was glad that I had taken this advise, affirming that this evill counfell which the Bishops gave the King, not to make good his promiles, but to breake whatfoever he had contracted with the Huguenots for him, had for many confiderations, brought her much affliction, especially seeing this inpetuous torrent drew along with it," and ruined the most understanding, and the faithfullest servants that the King had in his counsell for the King had thereupon removed foure or five of the mon mobile and apparent in all his Counfell) More over the affirmed, it left a deep impression in her, to fee the truth of what I represented, that flaying at Court, I could not avoide one of those two evills, either that the King my husband would dislike that flay, and be off inded at it, or that the King would distrust me, supposing that I gave intelligence to the King my husband, thee faid that the would perswade the King to give consent unto the voyage , which the did, and the King discoursed with me of it, withwithout the least apparence of being angry, being well content that he had diverted me from my husband, whom he hated more then all the world besides, and commanded that a Post should be dispatched to Don John of Austria, who commanded in Flanders for the King of Spaine, to intreat him to give me necessary warrants to paffe freely through the countrey of his Authority, because I must of necessitie travell through Flanders to goe to the waters of Span, which are in the lands belonging to the Bishop of Leige.

This being determined, we severed our felves for a little space, during which time my Brother imployed himselfe to instruct me in some defired offices concerning his enterprise in Flanders, and the King and Queene my mother removed to Poilliers. to be neerer the army of Monfieur de Mayenne, who befieged Brovage; and who from thence wasto paffe into Gafcogmy, to make warre against the King my husband. My brother also was to march with another army, of which he was Commander, to befiege Iffire, and some other Townes which shortly after he took in, and I prepared my felf for my Journey into Flanders, attended with Madame the Princeffe of Roche-fur-yon, with Madame de Tourner, my Dame of honour, with Madame de Mony of Picardie, with Ma: dame La Chaftel ayne of Millon, with Madamofelle d'Airis , with Madamofelle de Towmon; and with feven or eight Gentlewomen more, and with Noblemon, as Monfieur the Cardinall of Lenondourt, with Monfieut the Bilhep of Longras, with Monsieur de Mony Lord of Picardie, with the chiefe Equines, and many other Genclemen of my house. This company gave fuch delight to strangers, who found it fo full of flace and luftre, that they had France in farre more admiration: My litter was of Carnation velvet, imbroydered with works of Gold and Silke. The invention of the worke, and the Imprefles were casie to be seene; this Litter was glazed round, and every glaffe had a device in it, there being in the works of Velver, and in the glaffe, fourty different Inventions with Italian and Spanish Mortoes on the Sun, and his offects; this litter was followed with the litter of Madame the Princeffe of Roche-fur-yon, and with the litter of Madame de Tourson, my Dame of Honour , and with ten wayting Gentlewomen on Horfe, with their governeffe, and with fixe caroaches, in which the reft of the Ladies and women were:

I passed through Picardie, where the Citties had commandment from the King to receive me as if himfelf were prefent, and they did me all the honour that I could defire. Being arrived at Caffelet, which is a fort three miles from the frontire of Cambresis, the Bishop of Cambray, whole Church acknowledged nor then the King of Spaine, but for her Protector fent a Gentleman unto me, to know the houre of my departure thence, intending to meet me at my entrance into his Lands, where I found him well attended with people, who had the habite and apparence of true Flemmings, as they are very groffe in those parts. The Bishop was of the House of Barlemont, one of the Principall houses in Flanders, but who in a Flemmish brest had a Spanish heart, as they made it apparent to me, being one of those that did most assist Don John, but yet he received me with great honour, and no lesse Spanish ceremonies. I found this Citie of Cambray, although not builded with fuch frong materialls as ours of France, yet farte more delightfull, the Cities and houses thereof being better disposed, and proportioned, and the Churches very faire and large, a common ornament to all the Townes in France; that which I found in this Citie most remarkeable, was the Cittadell, one of the ftrongeft and faireft in Christendome, which being fince under the obedience of my Brother, the Spaniards to their costs have pro-A noble and worthy Gentleman, Monsieur de Ainsi was the Governour of it, who in grace, in presence, and all qualities requifire to a perfect Gencleman, was nothing inferiour to our most accomplifhed Courtiers, and no way partaking of that naturall clownifineffe, which feetseth proper to the Flemmings. shop made us a banquet, and delighted us after fupper, with the pleasure of a Maske, to which all the Ladies of that Citie came, but being there himself not present (for fuddenly after the supper, he retired himfelf, being as I have faid, of a Spanish and ceremonious humour) Monfieur de Ainfi, the most apparent in that troupe, was left behinde, to entertaine me at the Maske, and to have me afterwards to a Collation of confects, but very unadvisedly, as I conceive, for this was he who had the charge of the Cittadell; I speake this having learned it to my own expence, and knowing more(then I would defire) what belongeth to the guarditg of fuch a place. The remembrance of my brother being not not to be divided from my heart, because I loved nothing more then him, I often did thinke on the instructions which he had given me, and feeing a fayre opportuoitie offered to doe him good fervice in his enterprise for Flanders, this Citie and Cittadell being the key thereof, I quickned and imployed all the understanding which God had given me to render Monfieur de Ainsi affectioned to France, and more particular to my Brother, God gave fuch a bleffing to my discourse, that he delighted with it, determined to stay with me as long as possibly he could, and to accompany me during the time I stayed in Flanders, and to this intent, he demanded leave of his mafter to goe with me to Namur, where Don John of Austria did attend me, faying, That he defired to fee the triumphs of that entertainment. Flemming Spanioliz'd was notwithftanding so ill advised to let him goe, during this voyage, which continued ten or twelve daies, he spake unto me as often as he could, openly demonstrating that he had a heart addicted to the French, & that he only defired to live to fee the houre wherein he might have to brave a Prince as my Brother for his Lord and Master, despising the service and commands of his

Bishop, who although he was his Soveraigne, was but a Gentleman as himselfe, and farre inferiour to him in the qualities and graces both of minde and body.

Departing from Cambray, I lodged the night enfuing at Valenciennes in Flanders where Monfieur the Count of Lalain, Monfieur de Montigny his brother, and many other Gentlemen to the number of two or three hundred came to receive me at my comming out of the principality of Cambresis, unto which place the Bishop of Cambray conducted me. Being arrived at Valenciennes, a Town inferiour to Cambray in force, but not in the ornament of goodly buildings and of Churches, where the fountaines and the Clocks with industry proper to the Almains gave not a little cause of wonder to the French, it being not ordinary with them to hear the clocks expresse a pleasant Musick of the voice, with as many forts of persons as are in the little Castle in the Suburbs of Saint Germans: Monsieur the Count of Lalain, the Citty being under his government, made a feast to the Lords and Gentlemen of my troupe, where his wife and his faire Sifler Madame de Aurec and the most remarkable and bravest Ladies of that country arrended to receive me: He told me he was Cofin to the King my Husband, and he was a person of great authority and estate, to whom the Spainis insolence was alwaies odious, being strongly incensed against them since the death of the Count of Aigmont who was his neer kinsman, and although he maintained his government without being leagued with the Prince of Orange or the Huguenots, being athrice Catholick Lord, yet he could not endure to see Don John, or permit that either he or any of his should enter into his government, Don John not daring force him to the contrary, fearing that then the Catholick league in Flanders called the League of the Estates would unite themselves with the Prince of Orange and the Huguenots, wifely forefeeing, what a fform and tempelt would enfue, as they have proved fince who have governed there for the King of Spain. The Count of Lalain could not fufficiently expresse what a joy he did receive to fee me, and if his native Prince had then been present, he could not be received with more honour and demonstrations of wellcome and affection. Arriving at Monts at the Countes of Lalain with bour fourescore or a hundred Ladies of the City and Country, of whom I was received not as a frange Princesse, but as if I had had been their Soveraign by the priviledge of inheritance, the disposition of the Femmings is to be private, merry, and familiar, and the Counteffe of Lalain being of this disposition, and having a great and high Spirit, it gave me prefently an affurance that it were no difficult matter to enter into a ftrict friendship with her : The houre of supper being come, she went to the Banquet, and after to dancing which the Count of Lalain continued all the time of my aboad at Monts, which was longer then I determined, intending to depart the morning following, but this good woman inforced me to flay a feventh night with them, which I was unwilling to doe, fearing to overcharge them, nor was it possible for me to perswade her husband or her felfe, but they enforced me to flay till the eighth day were expired, living with fuch familiarity with me, the stayed atmy lying down very late, and would have staied longer but that she did what was very rare to doe in persons of her qua-Mey, which notwith anding did witnesse a nature attended with great goodnesse, the nourished her infant with her own milk to that being one morning at the feast, and fitting next unto me at the table which is the place where they of that Country doe com-communicate themselves with greatest friendship, and ayming at nothing but my content, which was altogether to advance my Brothers designes in Flanders, she being curiously drest and almost covered with precious stones and rich imbroyderies, having on a Kirtle of cloath of gold, whose ground was black, wrought with curious workes of imbroydery and purles of gold and filver, and a doublet of Cloath of filver whose ground was white, wrought with flowers of gold, and buttoned with great diamonds (a habit proper to the office of a Nurse) they brought unto the table her little childe, as richly dreffed as was the Nurse that gave it suck, she set the Childe on the table betwixt us both, and freely unbuttoning her felfe she gave her brest unto her little one; this had been counted incivility in any else, but she did doe it with fo great a grace and comelineffe, as her actions were all accompanied with it, that the received by it as much commendation, as the company delight. The banquet being ended, the dancing began in the same Hall wherein we were, which was very faire and a large roome, where being feated one next unto another, I told her that although the pleasures which I received in her company might Well I 4 well be ranked in the first number of those which gave me greatest reason to acknowledge them, yet I could almost wish that I never had en joyed them, by realon of the griefe I should receive in departing from her, and that Fortune shortly would deprive us from ever feeing one another, it being to be numbred amongst the misfortunes of my life, that heaven had not ordained that the and I thould live in one and the same Country. This I spake to make her enter into conference which might ferve for the defignes of my Brother; Thee replyed to me, this Country hath been fometimes part of France, and for this cause their pleadings in law are yet in French, and this naturall affection is not departed from the hearts of the most of us, for my part I have no other defire in my Soule, fince I have had the honour to have feen you; sometimes indeed this Country hood affected to the house of Austria, but that affection hath been torn from us in the deaths of the Count of Aigment, of Monfieur de Horn of Monfieur de Montigny and of the other Lords who were all our neer Colins, that were then defeated, and pertaining to the Nobility of this Country, we have nothing fo odious as the Spanish government, and defire nothing more, then WP to be delivered from their tyranny, nevertheleffe we know not yet how to effect it, because this Country is divided into different Religions, bur had we been united. we had thrown out the Spanyard long agoe, but this division doth render us roo feeble for them : I would to God that your Brother the King of France would be pleased to recover this Country, which in times precedent was his own, we would lend him all our helping hands; the spake not this in an unadvised suddaines but with premeditation to finde from France some remedy for their evils. I feeing the way open to what fo much I did defire, made anfwer, The King of France my Brother is not disposed to undertake forrain warres, especially at this present, having in his own kingdome the factious party of the Huguenets which is grown fo ftrong, that continually it will hinder him from commencing any wars abroad, but my Brother Monfieur de Alenfon who is nothing inferiour in valour, wisedome, and in bounty to the Kings my Fathers and my Brothers, will readily attend this enterprise, and will have no leffe meanes to bring fuccour to you, then the King of France my Brother, he is trained up in war, and efteemed one of the bravest Captains of this age, and won now commandeth the Kings army against the Huguenots, with which he hath taken finee my departure a very frong sown called Iffoire, and fome others, you cannot feek unto a Prince whose succour shall be more profitable to you, being fo neer your neighbour, and having so great a Realme as France at his devotion, from whence he may bring all the means and commodities necessary for the warre, and if he may receive that good office from the Count your Husband, you may affure your felves that you shall have what part in his fortunes that you will defire; my Brother is of a noble disposition not ingratefull, and who delighteth in nothing more then in acknowledging a fervice or good office done; he doth much respect and imbrace Gentlemen of courage and of honour, and is also followed with the bravest of the nobility of France; I believe they will thortly conclude a peace in France with the Huguenots, and that at my return I hall fee it accomplished; If the Count your Husband be of the same resolution as you are, and of the same defire, let him (if be please) acquaint me with it, and I will dispose my Brother to undertake it, Iaf fure my felfe that this Country and your house by it in particular will receive all hap-happinesse: And if my Brother should efablish himselfe here, you may affure your selfe you shall see me often, our friendship being such that never any Brother entertaind a Sifter with more perfect love: She received this declaration with much content, and told me that the spake not this at adventure, but feeing the honour I had done her to affect her, the was resolved not to leave me, untill she had difcovered to me the estate in which her Husband was, and till the had required that some remedy might be brought from France to release them from the feare in which they lived, being in perpetual! warre and danger to stoope to the infolence and tyranny of Spaine; She intreated me that with my confent the might relate unto her Musband the communication that paffed betwixt us, that on the next morning they both together might talke unto me of it, I very gladly confented to it, and we passed away that afternoone in fuch discourses, and in what ever else I thought might doe my Brother service, in which I found that the received great content.

The dancing being ended, we repayred to heare Vespers among the Canonesses, which is a Religious order that we have not in France, they are Gentlewomen which are placed there very young, for the improvement of their marriages, untill they are of age for husbands, they lodge not in common dormitories, but in feverall roomes, and in every roome: there are three or foure, or five or fix young Gentlewomen with an old woman of which old women, there is a certaine and distinet number, who are never married, nor the Abbeffe of them, they onely weare the habite of Religion in the morning at Mattens, and in the afternoone at Velpers. and as foone as fervice is ended, they put off their religious habite, and apparell themselves as other Gentlewomen that are to marry, going freely with them to the banquettings and dancing, fo that they dreffe themselves soure times a day, they were every day at the banquet, and daunced ordinarily after it. The Counteffe of Lalain thought it long till the evening was come to acquaint her husband with the good beginnings which the had given to these affaires, which having done, in the morning the brought her husband to me, who made a long discourse of the just-occafions which he had to free himfelf from the tyranny of the Spaniard, in which he intended not to undertake any thing against gainst his naturall Prince, knowing that the Soveraignty of Flanders belonged to the King of France, he represented to me what means he had to establish my Brother in Flanders, having all Hainault at his devotion, which extended as farre as Bruxells, he only was in doubt of (ambrefis, which lay betwixt Flanders and Hainault, and told me it would be expedient for me to gaine Monsieur de Ainsi, to which I replyed, that I would befeech him rather that he would be pleased to speak himself unto him, which he could doe more freely then my felf, being both his neighbour and his friend; having then presented to him what estimation and assurance he might make of the friendship of my Brother, and that the Fortune he should partake in, should be with as much greatnes and authoritie as the remarkeable fervice received from a person of his Quality could merit; we refolved at my returne to France, that I should stay at La fere, whether my Brother should come unto me, and that Monfieur de Montigny the brother of the faid Count of Lalain should come to treate there with him on those affaires; during the time of my abode there, I did encourage him alwayes, and fortifie him in that resolutio, to which his wife brought no leffe affection then my felf; And the day being come that I must depart from this goodly company at Monts, it was not without great and reciprocall griefe of all the Flemmilh Ladies, and my felf, and above all, of the Counteffe of Lalain, by reason of the great friendship which she had vowed to me having inforced me to promise her, to make my return that way, as I paffed into France. I did give unto her a Carcanet of Jewells, and to her husband a seale of pretious stones, which were esteemed of great value, but farre more prerious to them, because they came from the hand of one whom fo intirely they affected; all the Ladies stayed behind, except the Lady of Acree, who did goe with me to Namer, her husband Monfieur de Aurec, and Monfieur the Duke of Arfort Raying there, ever fince the peace betwixt the King of Spaine and the States of Flanders; for though they were both on the States fide, the Duke of Arfest was an ancient Courtier. and one of the most remarkable in King Phillips Court, at what time he was in Flanders, and in England, and he was alwayes in great effeeme, and next unto the Grandyes of his Court. The Count of Lalain, with all the Nobilitie of that Coun-

Countrey conducted me above two miles beyond his government, untill he faw the troupe of Don John appeare, then he took his leave of me, because he would not see him, only Monfieur de Ainfi did accompany me, because his master the Bishop of Cumbray was of the Spanish faction. That faire troupe being returned, having travelled a little farther, I was encountered by Don John of Auftria, who was attended indeed with many people, but onely with twenty or thirty horse, and with the Lords, the Duke of Arfcot, Monfieur de Aure, the Marqueffe of Varambon, and young Baken fon, Governour for the King of Spaine in the County of Burgundy, which Noble and gallant Gentlemen, hearing that I paffed that way, were come in a full speed to meet me : of Don Johns owne people, there were none of any name or fashion, but one Ladovick de Gonzagua, who filled himselfe Cosin to the Duke of Manua, the rest were but meane people, and of a fervile countenance, there being not any with him of the nobility of Flanders: He alighted from his horse, and fet foot on ground to falute me in my litter, which was lifted up, and opened round; I falured in the French garbe, both him, the Dake of Arfent, and Monfieur de

Aurec,

Aurecafter some complements, mounting againe his horfe, he discoursed with me till he brought me to the Towne, whither we could not come but very late, because the Ladies at Monts detained us as long as possibly they could, spending above an houre in the observation of my litter, and taking great delight to understand the manner, and the devices of it. The method of their building was fo beautifull at Namur, as the Spaniards are excellent that way, and their Towne to lightfome, that the windowes and the shops being full of splendor, one might beleeve that he faw a new day to shine there. That night Don John caused me and my traine to be ferved in our own lodgings and chambers, thinking that after follong a journey, it would be unmannerly to tire us againe with the tediousnesse of a banquet. The house wherein he lodged me, was well accomodated to receive me, where they found means to make a great and fayre hall, and an appartement for me of chambers and closets, which were hung round with the faireft, richeft, and braveft moveables, that I beleeve were ever feen, being all tapistries of Velvet or Satten, emboiled with great pillars made of cloath of filver, inchased with thick knots, and purles purles of Gold, and fet forth in the richest and most beautifull manner that could be invented, and in the middle of those pillars were great personages attired after the ancient fashion, and made of the same imbroidery. Monfieur the Cardinall of Lenoncourt, who had a curious and a delicate spirit, being a familiar friend of the Duke of Arfcots, who as I have faid, was an old Courtier, and a Gentleman of exquifite indowments, being indeed the only honour of Don Johns troupe, beholding, one day while I was there, those gorgeous and magnificent moveables, faid unto him, This furniture feemeth to me to appertaine rather to some mighty Monarch then to a Prince unmarried, and of no greater authority then Don John; the Duke of Arfcot replyed, they are the gifrs of Fortune, and not of Providence or abundance, these stuffes being sent unto him from one of the Bashaes of the Great Turke, whose sonnes in a memorable battell he tooke prisoners, and Signior Don John having done him the courtefie to return them to him without ransome, the Basha, to requite the good turne, did send him a great quantitie of stuffes of filke, and of cloath of gold, and filver, which were presented to him, being then at Myl lain, lair, a Citle where is choice of fuch pretious furniture, of which he made the Tapiffrey which you behold, and for an everlafting remembrance of the glorious archievement of them, he wrought the bed and the hangings of the Queens chamber in a most rich imbroidery, representing the glorious victory in that battell, which he gamed against the Turks : the morning being come, we heard Malle after the cirflome of Sprine, which was with Violing, Corners, and other musick, and departing thence unto the Feat in the great hall, he and I diddine at a table by our felves, the table where the Lords and the Ladies dined, was removed some three foot from ours, where Madame de Aurec had the honour done her for Don Johns house, having her drinke prefented to her by Lodovick Gmzagaa, kneeling. The banquet being ended, dancing began, which lafted all the afternoone, the evening paffed away in this manner, Don John discour-fing alwayes with me, and oftentimes repearing that he faw in me a refemblance of the Queen his Mifters, the late Queen of Spaine my Sifter, witnesling by all honorable courtefies that could be expreffed to me and my troupe, that he recelved an undiffembling joy to fee me there.

The Boate on which I was to paffe the River Mofe unto Lelge being not yet in readineffe. I was confrained to tarry there all the next day, where having paffed away the morning as we did the morne before; there was a faire Boate after dinner prepared for me in which we were ferryed to an Hand, being environed in our way with other Boars full of Hoboyes, Cornets and Viols; Don John had provided a banquer in the le, in a great hall made of guilded Leather, accomodated with Cabiners round about it, and filled with the mufick of Hoboyes and other infruments which continued all supper time. The Banquet being ended, and dancing having lasted almost an houre, we returned in the same Boat that did wafe us out, and which Don John had prepared for my voyage. The morning following we departed thence, Don John accompanied me in the Boat, and after a very honest and courteous farewell', he gave me to Monsieur and Madame de Aureo to attend me as far as Huy, where that night I was to lodge, which is the first rown that belongeth to the Bishop of Leige : Den John being gone forth, Monfieur de Ainfi who was the last that flayed in the Boat, and who had not permillion to conduct me further, with much grief K a griefe took his farewell of me, and with many protestations that he would remain a most constant servant to my Brother and my felfe : But false and treacherous fortune not able to support the glory of this To happy a condition which in my voyage hitherto did attend me, gave me two croffe prefages, which on my return, to content her envy, the had prepared for me. The first was that my Boat had no sooner removed from the shore, but Madamoifelle de Tournon, a virgin indowed with many virtues, whom I intirely loved, took fo ftrange a fickneffe, that on a fuddain the burft forth into ftrong and loud fhreiks by reason of the violence of the grief she felt, which did so oppresse her heart that the Physitians could provide no remedy, but within a few dales the was ravished by Death's I will relate this tragicall story in its own place, it being fo remarkable. The other was that arriving at Hay a town scituate on the declining of a hill, there brake forth on a suddain, so impetuous a torrent falling from the Mountain waters into the river, that ingroffing and devouring all at once, we could no fooner leape to land and run with all the speed we could to recover the top of the Hill, but the floud was there as foon as we. My lodgeing ing was on the upper and highest part of the Town, where that night we were content with what provision the Master of the House had of his own, who had not means to get Boats or people to fend down into the Town, which feemd overwhelmed in that vast Deluge, from which it was wonderfully delivered, as it was feized by it. for on the dawning of the day the waters were all returned, and retired within their proper channels. On my departure thence Monfieur and Madame de Auree returned to Namurunto Don John, and I took Boat to goe that day to Leigen where the Bilhon who is a great Lord received me with all the honour and demonstrations of good will that a courteous and well affected person could expresse : He was a Lord attended with great virtue, wisedome, and bounty and who spake very good French agreeable with his person, which was honorable and magnificent: He was attended with a Chapiter and many Canons, all fonnes of Dukes and Counts, and great Lords of Germany. Madame de Tournon who was then my Dame of honour had many daughters, the eldest whereof was maried to Monsieur de Balan an Governour for the King of Spaine in the County of Burgundy, who returning to his own Country increated Madame de Tournon his Mother to let him have another of her Daughters to affociate his wife being to live now in a place removed from her kindred; her Mother confented to it, and the flaying there fome yeers in improving her felfe, though her cheifest beauty was her virtue and her gracefull carriage, Monfieur the Marques of Varambon a man designed to the Church being refident in the fame house with his Brother Monfieur de Balanfon) by ordinary fociety of discourse and conversation with Madamoiselle de Tournon became very amorous of her, and being not yet obliged to the Church defired to espouse her; he propounded the motion to his own friends and to hers, they of her fide did well approve it, but his Brother Monfieur de Balanfon thinking it more profitable for him to have him of the Church, prevailed fo farre that he brake offthe Marriage, defigning to him, the habit and formality of the Gown. Madame de Tournon offended thereat, took from thence her daugh-

Her Daughter defiring nothing more then to be released from this tyranny. entertained a certain joy when the faw I was going into Flanders, truly conceiving that the Marques of Varabon would meet me there, and being now in the estate of Mariage for he had altogether abandoned the gown would peradventure demand her of her Mother, and that by the means of this Mariage the thould be delivered from her former perfecutions. The Marques of Varambon and his Brother the younger Balanfon did meet us at Namure, the young Balanson who was nothing to proper'a gentleman as the other, didcourt this maid in the way of Mariage, and the Marques of Varamben during our aboad at Namere, made semblance as if till then he had never feen her, at which the put on the apparence, of content, confrayning her felfe to feem regardleffe of it , but the trouble, the griefe and indignation thereof did fo contrach her heart, that as foon as they had taken their last farewell, and were departed from the Boat, the was strook with fuch a fuddain forrow that thee could not draw her breach but with many threikes and mortall pengs; having no other cause of her ficknesse, her youth did combat with death, for the space of eight or ten dayes, who armed with despite in the end did render himfelfe victorius, ravishing her from her Mother and my felf, who both did beanthis loffe with equall greife and pattion, for her Mother although the was a very fevere woman did love her most intirely : Her Funeralls were commanded to be performed with all folemnity, because the was discended from a great great and noble family, and pertained to the Queen my Mother; the day of her interrement being come, they appointed foure of my Gentlemen to bear the Corps. one whereof was Boeffier, who having in her life time passionately adored her, and not daring to discover it unto her by reason of the inequality of his birth, and the vertue which he observed in her, did carry now this mortall burden, and dyed as often in her death as the loffe of his love had ininterrupted and divided the course of his life, breathing our his foule after her in fighes, and every new minute bringing a new death unto him; this fatall convoy, being in the middle of the freets; and pafling to the Cathedrall Church, behold the Marques of Varamben, who guilty of this fad accident, some few dayes after my departure from Namur, repenting of his crueltie, and his ancient flame (O wonderfull) being kindled in her absence, which could not be awakened by her presence, he resolved to come and demand her of her Mother, trufting peradventure in the good fortune which did attend him, to be beloved of all whomfoever he defired , as fince it bath appeared in a Lady of eminent, account whom against her parents confents he hathefpouled; and promiting to himfelfe, that his Miftris de Tournon, would grant him an easie pardon, repeating these Italian words, che la forza d'amore non rifguarde al delitte , did befeech Don John to give him commission to come unto me, and making diligent halle, he came jult, as the body, as unhappy in her death as glorious and innocent in her Virginitie, was in the middle of the firest, the throng of the people at shis pompous folemnine, did hinder der him that he could not paffe, he looked about him to learne what the occasion was, and observed in the middle of the troupe; a multitude of mourners, and a white cloath crowned with Chaplets of flowers, he asked who it was, fome of the City made reply that it was a buriall, he growne more curious, advanced himfelf amongst the first of the convoy, and with much importunity defired to know who it was, O deadly answere, the vengeance of love for his ingratitude and inconstancie, made him now feele those ftroakes of death in his foule, which his forgerfaineffe and difdaine had made his Miltrelle fuffer in her body; the man not knowing who it was that preffed to know it, rold him that it was the body of Madamolfelle de Tournen lat that word he (Wounded away, and fel from his horfe, they carried him as dead into his lodging, juffly defiring in this extremity to approve that union with her in his death, which it his life too flewly he accorded to his Soul, as I believe, departing into her combe to crave pardon for what his difdainfail oblivion had committed, did leave his body for a wine without any apparence of life, and returning thence, did animate is anew; to make him feele again the

the justice of death, which once alone had not sufficiently punished his Ingratitude.

This fad office being performed, beholding my self in a company of strangers, I would not afflict them with the griefe which I received, for the loffe of fo vertuous a servant. I was invited either by the Bishops Grace, or by some of the Canons to dinner every day in severall houses and gardens, as there are very faire ones in that Citie. His Grace, with many Lords and Ladies, frangers, comming every morning to my chamber, accompanied me to the garden wherein I was to take the waters of Span, which was to be received walking, and though the Physitian that did prescribe it was my Brother, yet it hath done me good, having fince continued fix or feven yeeres without feeling the swelling of my arme; departing thence, we never parted company, but reforted to some feast, and after dancing, to heare Vespers to some religious house, and after fupper we were entertained with dancing againe, or else with Musick on the water. Six weeks did passe away themselves on this manner, which is the ordinary time accustomed for the taking of these waters, and which was prescribed to Madame the Princesse of Roche-fur-yon. As I was preparing to returne to France, beheld Madame de Aurec, who going to Lorrayn to feek her husband, expounded to us the wonderfull alteration that happened at Namer, and in all that Countrey, fince my departure, The same day wherein I departed from Namur, Don John going out of his boate, and taking horse, under prerence of hunting, came before the gate of the Cattle of Namur, the which as yet he had not maftered, and feigning (as cafually he passed by) to goe in, and see it in his way, he seized on it, and flew the Captaine whom the States kept there, breaking the Articles that were agreed on between the States and him, and moreover he seized on the Duke of Arscots, on Monfieur de Aurees, and on her owne perfon, and though after many demonstrations and intreaties, he let her husband and the Duke depart, yet he retained her till then, to be a caution to him for the deportment of them; She declared that all the Countrey was now in armes; there were three parties, the first of the States, which were the Catholicks of Flanders; the other of the Prince of Orange, and the Huguenots, who made but one Party; and the third of the Spiniards, over whom Don John commanmanded. I feeing my felfe imbarked in this manner, that of necessitie I must fall into the hands of the one or the other of them, and my Brother having fent a Gentleman named Lescar to me, by whom he wrote that fince my departure from France, God had given him the grace to serve the King so well in the charge of the army committed to him, that he had taken all the Townes which he was commanded to beliege, and chaced the Huguenots through all the Provinces in which his army was to march, that he was returned to Poiltiers, where during the fiege of Brouge the King continued to be neere at hand to fuccour Monfieur de Mayenne in what was necessary; that as the Court is a Proteus, that turnes his shape in every houre on the arriving of every new accident, fo at his recurn he found all things changed, that they made no more account of him, then if he had done nothing at all for the fervice of the King, that Buffi, whom the King seemed to countenance before his departure, and who had ferved the King in this warre in his owne person, and In the person of his friends, having lost his brother in an affault at the feige of Iffoire, was difreguarded alfo, and perfecuted with envy, as if it had been in the time of Le

Guaft, that every day they did procure him fome new Indignitie or other that the Kings minions had practifed with foure or five of his chiefelt fervants , Maugiron, La Valette, Mauleon, Livarrot and some of thers to abandon his, and to betake themfelves to the Kings fervice, that the King did much repent him of my voyage into Flanders, and that I should take heed in my returne, for feare of being furprised. either by the Spaniards, who were advertifed of what I treated in Flanders for him, or for the Huguenots, who would revenge on me the evills which he had done them, having first assisted them, and afterwards made warre against them. All this premised, wrought much in my confideration, feeing that not only of necesficie I must passe either amongst the one or the other of them, but that the Principall of my Company also were affected either to the Spaniards, or to the Huguenots, Monsieur the Cardinall of Lenoncourt, being suspected to favour the Huguenots, and Monfieur de Descarts, who was Brother to the Bilhops Grace of Leigh, to be ad licted to the Spaniards. In these doubts full of contrarieties, I knew not to whom to communicate my selfe, but to Madame the Princesse of Roche-sur-yon, and to Madame dame de Tournou, who knowing the danwherein we were, and finding we had five of fixe dayes journey to La Fere being to palle all the way under the mercy of the offe or other of their two parties, attfwered me with teares in their eyes, that God alone could preferve me from that danger, that I should recommend my felf to him, and then doe as his inspirations did direct me; As for them, though one of them was fick, and the other stooped with the weight of Age, they defired me not to forbeare to make long journeys, and that they would indeavour themselves to the utmoft to draw me from this danger. I foake unto the Bishop of Leigh, who was indeeda Father to me, and gave me his grand mitter with horfes to conductume as farre as I would defire , and becanse it was needfull for us to have a Warrand for free paffage from the Prince of Orange , I fent Mondoucet thither O who was his affociate quand relified fomething of that Religions hereumed thence no more, I expected two or three dayes his comming, and thelieve that thould I have waited till he came, I thould have flayd there hill I was daily conutailed be Monfieur the Cardinall of Benontour and my chiefe Efquire Salviati, who were both of one complexion not to depart without a Paffe, and finding their deligne did bend another way, I was refolved to goe betimes the morning following, they feeing they could not flay me with this present, Salviati being of intelligence with my Treasurer, who was alfoia private Huguenot, exhorted him to fay that there was not money left enough to discharge my expences, which was extreamly falle, for being arrived at la Fire, I looked on the accounts, and there was money enough to defray the charges of at least fix weeks travaile more, yet they caused my horses so be staied, giving this publick affront with great danger to me. Madame the Princesse of Roche-fur-you being the able to indure this indignity, and feine the danger wherein Iwas did lend me what money I thought necessary, and they remaining confused at it, I departed thence having made a present to the Bishop of a Diamond worth three thousand Crowns, & given to all his fervants either chains or rings of gold, and I came to Hay having no protection bur my hope in God. That Town as I have faid belonged to the Bithopiof Leige; but full of tumult and mutiny (as all the people there knew of the generall revolt of the Low-Countries) and and would no longer acknowledge the Bishop, because he lived as a newtrall, and they were a professed party with the States, fo that without any respect to the grand Mafter of the Bifhop of Leige who was with us, hearing how Don John had seized on the Castle of Namar in my travails that way, as foon as we were lodged, their drums did beat an Alarm, and they brought their artillery into the street, and made Barricadoes against my lodging, stretching forth their chains that we should not come together, and held us all that night in these perplexities, without having the means to speake to any of them, being all a filly people, a brutish nation, and without reason: In the morning they suffered us to goe ; having filled the ftreets through which I was to passe with armed ment sour oans empo eniod c where by misfortune that day they chose their Burgomasters, who are as Consuls, in Gascagny and France. All that day was spent in debanchment, all the world was drunk, no knowledge of Magistrates, but a true Chaos of confusion, and to make our condition yet worse, the grand Master of the Bishop of Leige had sometimes made warre against them, and was taken by them for their mortall enemy; this town when the people are fober and in fence, hold for the States, but Bucebur dominering now amongs shem, they could not hold it for themselves, and indeed neither knew nor acknowledged any master. As foon as they beheld a troupe great as mine to approach their Suburbs, the alayum grew hot amongst them, they for fook their glasles toron to armes, and all in a tumuls in fleed of opening the gate they barred in fall against me. I had fent a Gentleman before with the Harbingers and the Marthall of my lodging so intreate them to give me passage, but I found them at the gate crying to those who did not understand them: In the end I flood up in the Litter, and taking of my Mask, I made a figne to the mohapparent of them, that I would freak unto him, who being come unto me, I intreased him re cause filence to be made , to the end I might be understood, which with much a doe being obtained, I declared to them who I was, and the occasion of my Voyage, that fo farre it was from me to being any hurt unto them by my comming that I would not give them the leaft fufpition ofit, I intreated them to permit me and my women onely to emer into the Town, with as few of my Men as they pleased, pleased, telling them that I would leave the reft behinde me in the Suburbs; they accepted of this proposition, and I came into the Town with the most apparent of my troupe in which number was the grand Master of the Bishop of Leige, who by chance was knowne as I entred into my lodging, environed with this people drunken and armed, then they began to cry out, that they were injured, and to charge upon him who was a reverend man of fourescore yeers of age, having a white beard down to his girdle. I caused him to make hafte into my lodging against which these drunkards plyed their Harqu:buses with volleyes of thor as thick as haile, the walls being made but of earth only. Seeing this tumult I demanded if the Host of the house were within, by good fortune they found him, I defired him that he would goe unto the window, and make way for me to speake to the most remarkable of them, which with great difficulty I procured; he having a long time called to them out of the window, at length the Burgomasters came to parly with me, but fo full of fwill, that they knew not what they faid; In the end affirring them, that I knew not that the grand mafter was their enemy, demonstrating of what impor-L 3 tance tance it was to offend a person of my quality, who was a friend to the principall Lords of the States, and that Monfieur the Count of Lalaine, and all other Chieftaines would give them but little thankes for this their entertainment of me; having heard the name of Monfieur the Count of Lalaine, they presently became of another minde, and gave more respect to him, then to all the Kings to whom I appertained, the most antient of them betwixt stammering and laughing, demanded of me, if I was then a friend to Monsieur the Count of Lalaine; I feeing that his confanguinity would stand me more in stead then all the Potentates in Christendom, made answer, yes, I am not only his friend, but his kinfwoman also, then they did reverence to me, and gave me their right hand of friendthip, offering as much courtefie, as before they had committed infolence, and befought me to excuse them, affirring me that no wrong should be done to that good man the Grand-master of the Bishop of Leige, and that he should goe along with The morning being come, as I was going to heare Maffe, the Kings Agent that was refident with Don John named Du Bois who was a French man extreamly Spanielized, came unto me, faying, that he had letters and command from the King to attend and conduct me in my return to France, and for that end he had increased Don Folm to let me have Barlemont with a troupe of Horse for my guard to bring me without danger to Namur, desiring me to speak to those of the Town to grant entrance to Monsieur Barlemont who was a Lord of that Country, and to his troupe of Horse; This was done for a double end, to make themselves Masters of the Town. and to make me fall into the hands of the Spanyards. I found my felf here in a great streight, and communing with Monsieur the Cardinall of Lenoncourt, who had no greater defire then my selfe to fall into the hands of the Spanyards, we concluded to know of the Towns men if there were any way by which we might avoide the troupe of Monsieur de Barlemont, and leaving my little Agent Du Bois to discourse with Monfieur de Lenoncourt, I walked into another Chamber where I caused those of the Town to come unto me, and declaring to them that if they gave entrance to the troupe of Monfieur de Barlemont they were all undone, because that he would seize on their town for Don John, I counsailed them to arme themselves, and to stand on their their guard, and being ready at the Gate to flew the countenance of mon of understanding that would not be surprised they did allow and believe my reasons offering to lose their lives in my service, and gave me a guide to lead me a way where by paffing over the river that ran betwixt the troupes of Don John and mine, I should cast them so farre behinde, that they could not overtake me, going all the way after by Towns which held for the States. Having taken this resolution, I sent them to the Gate, and Monfieur de Barlemont who was already entred did importunately perswade the Townsmen to permit his troupe to come in alfo. They hearing this, began all to fall upon him, so that he hardly escaped from being maffacred amongst them, telling him that if his troup did not forthwith retire from the fight of their Town they would discharge their Artillery upon them, this they did to give me leafure and the advantage to paffe the water, before that troupe could overtake me. Monfieur de Barkmont and the Agent Du Bon did what they could, to per-Iwade meto goe to Namur, where Don John arttended me, I made apparence to doe what they defired, and to follow their ad-advice, and having heard Maffe, and made a short dinner, I came out of my lodging, attended with two or three himdred of the towne in armes, and conferring all the way with Monfieur de Barlement, and the Agent Die Bois, I tooke my direct course towards the mouth of the river, which was contrary to the way unto Namur, where the troup of Mon. de Barlemont expected me: they observing it, told me, that I had mistooke my way, but I beholding them still in discourse, passed on, till I came unto the gate of the Town, going out of which, and accompanied with a good number of the townes men, with doubled speed I hasted towards the river. and taking boate, I caused all the chiefest of my traine to enter with me, Monfieur de Barlement, and the Agent du Bon crying continually on the Bank-fide, that it was not my neerest way, that it was crosse to the Kings intention, who would have me goe by Namur; notwithstanding their out-eries, we ferried over the water with what speed we could, and while they made two or three fares to carry my litters and horses over, those of the towne, on purpose to give metime, with a thousand outcries and complaints, delayed and amazed Mon-

Monfieur de Barlemont, and the Agent du Bois, reasoning with them on the wrongs which Don John had done them, having fallifyed his faith with the Estates, and broken the peace, and arguing with them on antient quarrellit sebout the death of Count Aigment, and meatning them continually, that it meir troupe appeared nigh the Towne, they would discharge their Ordnance upon them; this gave me the leifure to fecure my felf, being delivered from all feare and danger, by the guidance of God, and this good man whom they had given to conduct me. I lodged that night in a strong Castle named Flurines, which belonged to a Gentleman who held with the Estates, and whom I had feen with the Count of Lelain, but fuch was the mischance, that the Gentleman was not within, there being none at home but his wife only, who feeing us in the Bafe-Court which lay all open, the tooke a fudden fright, and drawing up the bridge, did flie into the Caftle, refolving, fay what we could, not to let us in. In the meane while three hundred Gentlemen, whom Don John had fent to intrap me by the way, knowing that I went to the Castle of Fluxines to lodge there, did appeare upupon a little hill fome mile from thence, and beleeving that we were got into the Castle, for they might see from thence, that we were all entred into the Court. there made a stand, and lodged there that night, hoping the next morning to intrap us. As we were in these perplexities, feeing our felves no farther than in the Base-court, which was inclosed only with a weake wall, and defended with as bad a gate, which had been eafie to be forced, we continually parlyed and disputed with the Gentlewoman of the Caftle, who was inexorable to our prayers; but it pleafed God, in the duske of the evening to send her husband Monsieur de Fleuriner, who presently received us into his Caftle, and was extreamly angry and paffionate with his wife for the incivilitie, and indifcretion which the flewed. Gentleman, Monsieur de Fleurines, was fent on purpose to me from the Count of Lalaine, to give me a fure convoy through the townes of the Estates, being not able to accompany me himself, because he could not abandon the army, being a chief Commander for the States, so happy was this Gentlemans incounter with me, that conducting me into France, we passed no more by any Townes, wherein we found

not honourable entertainment, because it was the Countrey of the Effates, this was the only displeasure which I received, that I could not paffe by Monts, as I promifed the Counteffe of Lalain, our way lying no neerer to it then Nivelles, which is feven long mile from thence, and I could not fee her husband the Count of Lalaine, because the warre growing hot, he was in the Army of the States, towards Anvers. I wrote unto her only from thence, on the behalfe of the Gentleman that conducted me. She, as foone as the learned where I was, did fend unto me the chiefest of her Gentlemen to conduct me to the Frontires of France, for I was to paffe through all Cambrefis, which was divided one half for the Spaniard, and the other for the States. I travelled with them to the Caftle of Cambrefit, from whence they returning, I femther in remembrance of me, one of my Gownes, which I heard her very highly prize when I did weare it at Monts, it was of black Satten, covered with imbroyderies, which coft me nine hundred crownes. Arriving at the Caftle of Cambrefis, I was informed, that certain troupes of Huguenors had a deligne to arrache me betweene the Frontites of France and Flanders , which I difclofing but but so a few, was ready to depart the next morning an house before day. Sending for my liner, my Esquire Salviati prolonged the time, as he had done before at Lings, and perceiving that he did this on purpole, I left my litter, and taking horfe, hose that first were ready followed me. I came to Caftelet by ten of the clock in the morning, having by Gods goodnesse escaped all the wiles and ambufcadoes of my enemies. I departed thence to my house of La Fere, intending to continue there, till I heard a peace concluded; I found there a Poste of my Brothers arrived before me, who had a charge to arrend my comming, and as foone as I was arrived to return in all hafe to acquaine him with it. He wrote to mothar the Peace was made, and that the King was returned to Parir, that for himself his condition of efface was daily worse then other, there being no mdignity and diffgrace, which he and his did not daily prove, and that every houre brought in new and unjust complaints against Buff, and the honest Gentlemen that arrended on hims that with extreame inipatience he expected my return to La Fere, intending there to meet me. I fuddenly differented his melfenger unto him, by whom advertifed of my return, he forthwith fent Buffi, with all his house to Angers, and taking only with him fifteen or twenty of his fervants, he came in Post to La Fere unto me, which was one of the greatest contenuments that ever I receid ved, to have that perion with me, whom fo intirely I did affect and honour and I endeavoured my felf, to give him all pleafures which I thought might make that place delightfull, which helfo well accepted, that willingly he would have faid with Saint Peter, Let we bere make in tabernacles, had not his royall Courage, and the Nobleneffe of his active Soul, called him to enterprifes of Renowne and Glory. The peace and pleasure of our Court, in comparison of that from whence he came, did render every houre to delightfull, that he could not forbear oftentimes from crying our, O my Queen, how good is is to be with you, This Court is a Paradife filled with all variety of delight, and that from whence I came, a hell, peffered with all manner of torments, and furies: 11 21000

We flayed there about two moneths, which in that happy estate, were to us but two short daies, during which time, having made him account, of what I had done for him in my voyage into Flanders, and certified him in what terms. I had left his affayres, he thought it expedient that Monfieur the Count of Montigny brother to the Count of Lalain fhould come, and refolve him what course he was best to hold therein, and to take affurances of their good will, and they reciprocally of his. He came unto my Brother, with foure or five of the chiefest Lords of Haiwante, the one whereof had a letter, and command from Monlieur de Ainfi, to offer his fervice to my brother, and to affure him of the Cittadell of Cambray. Monficur de Montigny promised that his Brother the Count of Lulaine, would deliver into his hand call Hainault and Artois, where are many goodly Townes. These offers and affurances being received, my Brother fent them backs with Prefents. which were Medalls of Gold, wherin were his and my figure flamped, and with reaffurances of all additions, and benefits that they could expect. Returning home, they prepared all things for my Brothers comming who making all the disparch he could to have his forces ready, tourned to Court to fee what affiltance the King would give him to furnifh him in this enterprife, and I defiring to go into Gefcoguy, having prepared all things for that effect, returned to Paris, my brother met mer on the way, a dayes journey from it, and the next day the King, the Queen my Mother and the Queen Louise, with all the Count, did meet me as farre as Saint Denis, where I was to dine, where they received he with great honour, and many welcome, taking great delighe to heare me recount the honours and magnificence of my voyage, and of my abode at Leige, and the advencures of my return. In this pleasing encertainment of discourse, being all in the charries of the Queen my Monkey, we came to Parit, where having supped, and the Musker ended, the King and Queen my mother, being both together all approached to them, and befought them that they would not think ill of it wif I increased them dist they would be pleafed to grant me leave to goe to the King my husband, inging, that the peace being concluded, my journey could not be sofrected by them, and that it would be prejudiciall to my honour land unbe-feeming the duty of a wife, should liftay any longer from him whey both expres fed themselves to like it well, and with free applicate did enterraine the motion, and the Queene my Mother told me, that thee would accompany me her felfe her voyage being necellary in that Coun-

Country for the service of the King, moreover the added, that it was needfull that the King frontd grant me maincenance for the expences of my journey, to which the King did give confent, and I defiring to leave nothing behinde which might cause me to return to Court, being no longer able to take pleasure in it, my Brother going from it, whom I faw with all speed preparing into Flanders, I befought my Mother to remember her felfe in what the promised me at the Peace concluded with my Brother, and that before I undertooke my journey into Gascogny the would make over the Lands unto me for the affignation of my Dowry: She acquainted the King with it who found it very realonable; and promiled me that it fould be done; I befought him that it might be done with speed, for I defired to begin my journey, if he thought good, on the beginning of the moneth enfuing: this also was promised, but according to the fallion of the Court, for inflead of difpatching me, though every day I did folicite film i I was deferred five or fix moneths; and to likewife was my Brother who was as urgent for his voyage into Flanders, though he represented daily to the King; that it was for the honour M and inlargement of France; that it would prove a happy occasion to hinder the Civill warres, all the moving spirits and defirous of movelry having the apportunity to goe into Flanders; to paffe away; their discontent and choller there, and to glut themselves with Warre; that this enterprise would ferve as fornetimes Piedmont did, as a Schoole for the Nobility of France in their exercise of armes, and there revive the Montleker, and brave Briffacs, the Terms and Bellegards, and fuch as those great Marshalls were . Who trayned up in the Warres of Piedmont; have fince fo gloriously and successefully ferved their King and Country. Their demonstrances were fair and true enough. but they had not fo much weight, as to be ballanced with the envy which was born to the enlargement of my Brothers fortunes, to whom every day administred new occasions of delay, to hinder him from affembling his forces, raifing fometimes on himselfe, sometimes on Buffi, and his other fervants a thoufand fcandals and complaints; Buffi being daily inveighed against either by Quelu or Gramont , who watched by those unjust Alarms to rouse up my Brothers rage to the overthrowing of his fortunes. All this was done without the knowledge of the King; but Mangiron who then did most possesse him, having forfaken my brothers fervice, and believing that he was fenfible of it, (as it is ordinary, that he who offendeth doth never pardon) did prosecute my Brother with fo ftrong a hate, that he did vow his ruine, and ar every word did undervalue and outbraye him, as the impudency of youth blown up with the Kings favor, did drive him to all kind of infolence and outrage, and combined himselfe with Quelus, Saint Luke Saint Maigrin , Gramont, Mauleon, Liverest and other young people whom the King favoured, and these being followed by all the Court, after the fashion of Courtiers who hunt after favor did practife all things whatfoever came into their fantafie; In a manner that not a day paffed wherein there was not a quarrell betwixtthem and Buffi; who in courage was not inferiour unto any. My Brother confidering that this was not the way to advance his voyage into Flanders, defiring rather to mitigate the King then to exasperate him, and beleeving befides. that Buffi being abroad might increase the number of his forces ; and provide things necessary for his army inhe fent him through his principalities to give order for M 2 forit; but Buffi being gone, the perfecution of my Brother ceased not, and then was it understood that although his brave qualities wrought much jealoufly in the breft of Mangiron and the reft of thefe younkers that were neer unto the King, yer the principall cause of their hatred against Buffi was, that he was my Brothers drvant; for after he was gone; they outbeived and derided my Brother to apparently, and with fuch despite, that all the world perceived te, although my Brother was very wife and parient in his own nafor the dispatch of his affaires in Flanders , hoping by this means to be quickly gone, and no more to be found a Subject for them. This perfection howfoever and indignity was very grievous to him, especially feeing inhare to him, they did daily moleft and wrong his fervants, having lately made Monfreur de la Chafte lose a great fuit, because that a little before he became my Brothers fervant, the King being to carried away by the perfwations of Mungition; and Saint Luke, who were friends to Madame de Senaire, that he himfelfe did fulicite the processe for her aeatiff Monfieur de la Chaftre, who was then with my Brother, and finding himfelfe felfe oppress with the injury thereof, did make my Brother partake of the just griefes he fuffered.

In those dayes, the Mariage of Saint Luke was folemnized, at which my Brother (not willing to affift) defired me to be absent also, and the Queen my Mother who took no pleasure in the boundlesse arrogance of these young people, fearing that all that day would be in debauchment and excesse, and that my Brother not being there, they would give a malicious interpretaion of his absence, which might prove prejudiciall to him, procured the Kings good will, that the thould goe abroad on the mariage day to dinner at Saint Maurm, and took my Brother and my felfe with her: It was on Shrovemunday, on the evening we returned; the Queen my Mother so prevailed with my Brother, that he confented that night to be present at the dancing to content the King, but instead of amending his condition, it did impaire it; for Mangiron and his companions being there, they began to play on my Brother with fuch keene and pointed language, that a meaner person then himselfe would have been offended at it, faying that he had loft his paines to re-attire himselfe, that they could not find him after dinner to fay fo much as, Much good d'it you, to him, that he came in the houre of darknes, because it was proper to him, reviling him for the meannelle of his habit; and for the ficklinelle of his changed complexion : All this was fpoken to the Bride that fate next unto him; My brother knowing it was done on purpose to make him answer, and by this means to fer him at distance with the King, did fling away from thence so full of choler and despite, that he could forbeare no longer; but having deliberated with Monfieur de la Chastre, he resolved to absent himselfe a while from Court to goe unto the Chace, thinking by his absence to qualifie the heat of these young people, and to render his affayres with the King more easie, for the preparation of his army which was necessary to goe unto Flanders. He addreffed himself to the Queen my Mother, who was very forry to hear of this difference, and acquainted her with the resolution he had taken, which the did well approve, and affored him that the King thould condificend unto it. and that the would folicite him in his abfence for a dispatch in what he promised . concerning his enterprise in Flanders, And Monfieur de Villequier standing by, shee com-commanded him to goe unto the King, and acquaint him with the defire which my brother had to goe for a few dayes a hunting, which the King allowed, thinking it would be a means to appeale the differences which were betwixt him and the young people Mangiron, Saint Luke, Quelu, and the reft. My brother retiring into his Chamber holding his fuit granted, commanded all his people to be ready the next morning, to attend him at Saint Germans, where intending to make his aboad for certain dayes, he gave order to his chiefe Hunter to have his Dogs in readinesse, and betook himselfe to his rest that night, with an intention to rife early the morning following to goe unto the Chace, either to folace his spirits, or a little to divert them from the novie and tumult of the Court : Monfieur de Villequier repaired to the King to demand leave of him, to which he did accord, but remayning in his Cabinet, with the Counfaile of Rehoboam, which was five or fix young fellows, they presented to him that this departure of my brothers was much to be suspected, and put him into such an apprehension, that they made him commit one of the greatest overfights that this our age did know, which was to take my brother and his chiefest Servants prisoners, which as it was unwifely determined, so was it rashly executed; for the King catching hold of these words, went fuddainly in the night, in a great passion to finde the Queen my Mother, as if it were a publick alarm, or as the enemie had been at the gate, and faid unto her, Now Madam! what doe you think you have done by demanding leave for my Brother ro go, Doe not you fee the danger in which you put my effate, without all doubt, under this pretence of hunting, there lies some dangerous enterprise; I will goe seize on him, and all his people, and I will cause his coffers to be broken open, I affure my felf we shall discover somthing of importance. He had with him the Captaine of the Guard, Monsieur de Losse, and some of the Scotch regiment. The Queen my mother fearing in this precipitation, that my Brothers life would be in jeopardie, earneftly defired that shee might goe along with him, and because she was all undressed, throwing her night-gowne on her, fhe made hafte up after him to my Brothers chamber, The King was knocking furionly at the doore, commanding it to be opened, pronouncing that the King was there: My Brother awaked at this tumult, mult, and knowing that he had not committed any thing that might give him the least occasion of feare, he commanded Cange the Groom of his Chamber, to open the doore; the King rufhing in, began to taxehim, and to tell him that he would never leave to practife against his State and him, and that he would make him know what it was to attempt against his Prince: On that, he presently commanded the Guard to carry forth his coffers, and to take the groomes of his chamber with them; He fearched my Brothers bed himfelf, and turned and toffed it, to fee if he could finde any papers there. My Brother having a letter of Madame de Sauvaes, which he received that evening, did take it into his hand, that the King might not fee it, the King inforced himfelf to take it from him, and my Brother refifting, and with joyned hands intreating him that he would be pleased not to looke on it, he made the King more defirous to peruse it, beleeving that in that paper he should finde a sufficient ground to commence his processe against him. In the end, having opened it in the presence of the Queene my mother, they were as much abashed at it, as was somerimes Cate, who in the Senate having constrained Cafar to show the paper that was brought unto him, importunatly implying that it concerned the benefit of the Common-wealth, he perceived, that it was a wanton letter of love, directed from his fifter to him. The fhame of this event, that came to croffe to the expectation of the King, augmented by despight his choler, to that he gave no care unto my brother, who inceffantly demanded, of what he was accused, and wherefore he was fo intreated? He was committed to the charge of Monfieur de Losse, and there was a Guard fet over him of the Scotch regiment, with command not to permit him to talke to any : this was done an houre after midnight; My brother remaining still in this manner, was in greater perplexitie for me, then for himfelf, beleeving truly that they would doe the like by me, and that so violent and unjust a beginning, could not have but as untoward an ending, and feeing that Monfieur de Losse had teares in his eyes, for griefe to fee things carried after this manner, and that by reason of the Guard there present, he durst not speak freely to him, he only asked him what was become of me, Monfieur de Losse made answere, that as yet he heard nothing of me; My brother straight replyreplyed, It is a great comfort to me in this affliction, to heare that my Sifter is at libertie, but although the be in that free eltate, the affecteth me fo intirely, that the would rather be in bondage with me, then live in libertie without me, and defired him to goe to the Queen my mother, and befeech her that she would be pleased to obraine of the King, that I might endure my captivitie with him, this the King did grant; this unshaken beleefe which my brother had of the affurance of my love, was fuch a particular obligation to me, though his good offices might challenge from me many and great acknowledgements, that I have ever placed it in the first ranke of all; as foon as he had this permiffion, which was upon the break of day, he defired Monfieur de Losse, to send one of the Guard to acquaint me with this melancholy newes, and to defire me to come unto him, the yeoman of the guard, comming into my chamber, found me afleep, not dreaming of any thing that had pafsed; he opened my curtaine, as I was opening my eyes, and in a language proper to the Scots, said unto me, Bon jour Madame! Monfieur your brother defires you, that you would come unto him. I looked on the Man, being not halfe awaked and even ready to fall afleep againe, and knowing him, I demanded of him, if he was not one of the Scottish guard, he answered, yes: I replyed. What is the matter, hath my brother no other messenger then you to fend? he answered, No, for all his people are taken from him, and told me in his language all which that night had happened, and perceiving I was much afflided at it, he approached neerer to me, and spake that my servants being present, might not heare him, Doe not torment your felf Madame, I have a means to fave Menfieur your Brother, and affure your felfe I will performe it, but of neceditie I must then goe with him; I answered him, that he should be rewarded above his hopes, and making hafte to dreffe me. I went with him alone to my Brothers chamber, In niy way I was to goe through all the Court, then full of people, who were accustomed to runne to fee, and honour me, but perceiving how Fortune now had changed her countenance, they made as though they had not feen me; comming into my brothers chamber, I found him with fo great a constancie, that he was not changed at all from his usuall disposition, and tranquility of Mind, and feeing me, he imbraced me, and with a countenance rather ther joyfull then dejected, faid, My Queen, I beseeh you forbear those teares, In this condition that I am, your grief is the only thing that can afflict me, for my innocence and true intentions doe prohibit me to feare any of the accusations of my enemyes, but if unjustly they shall attempt against my life, they who shall performe it, will be more cruell unto themfelves, then me, who have courage enough to undergoe and despise the stroak of 6 unjust a death, neither is it that so much which I respect, for my life hath hithereo been accompained with so much forrow and affliction, that not knowing any of the pleafures of this world I shall not have the greife to abandon them, the faddeft apprehension which I have is, that wanting a cause to make me justly to dye, I hall languish in the folitude of tedious imprisonment, where yet I shall despise the tyranny of my enemies, feeing you will fo much oblige me as to affilt me with your prefence; thefe words in flead of ceating my tears did fo increase them, that out of my eies Ithought I should have pow red all the moisture of my life; I answered him in fobs, that my life and fortunes were woven into his, that it was in the power of God alone to hinder me from affifting him him in lany condition that I could, that thould the King take me thence, and not fuffer meto continue with him I would kill my felfe in his prefence; Patting the day in this discourse, and feeking together the occasion that made the King proceede in forcruell and unjust aucourfe against him, and not able to conceive it; the hours came about for the opening of the Caftle gate, where an indifcreenlyoung fellow who was fervature Buffi, being known and fraid by the guardo was demanded by them, whither helwas going, he being amaled with the ftrangenes of the fuddain interrogatory made answer that he was going to feek his Mafter Jothis being reid unto the King vit was sufpected that he was within the Lature, where comming that after noone from Saint Gemany my brother had caufed him to enter to with the reft of the troupe to confer with him on the affaires of his army which was going unto Flanders, not thinking then he should so suddainly depart from Court as unexpectedly after wards itcame to paffe. That evening you the occasio on aforefaid, Archant the Captaine of the Guard received Commandement from the King to lookshim out, and to feize on him and Simier; who making this this inquisition to his griefe, because he was an intimate friend of Buffies, and by alliance called him Sonne, as Bufficalled him Father, he came up into Simiers Chamber where he leized on him, and doubling that Buffi there had hid himfelfe, he made a light fearch being glad that he did not finde him, but Buffi who lay then on the bed, and perceived that he should be left alone, fearing that the fame Commission should be given to another with whom he should not be in so much fafety, he defired rather to be under Archants custody, and being of a merry and spiritfull disposition, in whose breft no danger could work the base effects offeare, as Archant was going out of the doore to lead Simier away, he put out his head betwixt the Curtains and cryed out, why, hoe there A What will you go without me Father, doe not you thinke my conduct more honourable then such a rakestraws, as is Simiers; Archant turned to him, and faid, Ah my Sonne, I would to God it had cost me one of my armes that you were not here; he replyed, tush, my affaires goe well, playing all the way as he went with Simier, and laughing at him for the trembling feare wherein he faw him : Archant fhut them up both into one Chamber, and fer a guard over them, and went from thence to take Monfieur de la Cafire, whom he carried to the Baftille.

While these things were in the execution, Monlieur de Loffe a good old man who had bin governour to the King my Husband in his nonage, and who rendered me as his own childe, having now the custody of my brother, knowing how unjustly he was dealt withall, and detelling the bad counfaile by which the King was governed, having a defire to oblige us both, resolved to save my brother, and the better to discover his intention to me, commanded the Scotch guard to Waite without doores on the staires head, detaining onely two with him, in whose fecrecy he much trufted, and taking me by the hand he faid, There is not a true Frenchman, whose heart bleedeth nor to fee that which we behold, I have been too long a servant to the King your Father, to refuse to offer up my life a facrifice for his children, I believe that I shall have the guard of Monfieur your brother, in whatfoever place they will keep him; Affure your felfe that with the hazard of my life I will preferve his, but to the end that this resolution may not be perceived, let les us ralke no more together, bur be certain of itd "This promite gave me a little comfort, a rouzing up my fpirit, I rold my brother, that we ought not to be kept in this manner, like people taken by the Inquifition, without knowing what we had done, that thus they use felons and the vilett of malefactors when they had taken them prisoners. I intreated Monfieur de Loffe, fince the King would not permit that the Queen my Mother should come unto us, that he would be pleased to let us know by any of his fervants the cause of our restraint : Monsieur de Combout who was cheife of the Counfaile of these young people was sent unto us, who with a gravity that was naturall to him. told us that he was fent thither to know what was that, which we defired the King should understand; We made answer, that we defired to speak with any one from the King to know the occasion of our confinement which we our felves could not conceive : He gravely replyed, that we must not demand of Gods and Kings the reason of their actions, that they did all things for a good and a just cause; we made answer again , that we were not persons to be held as those whom they put in the the Inquisition, concerning whom we must divine what they had done; we could draw nothing else from him, but that he would imploy himselfe for us, and that he would doe us all the best offices which he could: My Brother began to laugh out right, but I who was turned all into griefe to see my brother in danger, whom I cherished above my own life, had much adoe to forbeare from speaking to him, as he deferved.

While he was making this report unto the King, my Mother being in her Chamber, opprest with manifold afflictions, and even fick with forrow, as a wife perfon did foretee that this excesse made either without reason or subject would bring a swift and dreadfull devastation on the Kingdome, if my Brother had not the better disposition; and sent for all the old Counsellers, Monsieur the Chancellour. the Princes, Lords, and Marthals of France who were all wonderfully offended and scandalized for the bad Councell which was given to the King, faying all to the Qu. my Mother, that the ought to oppose it, and represent unto the King the wrong which he had done, that they could not hinder the error from being undone which already was committed, but they ought to repeale it after the best manner they could could. The Queen my Mother with all the Lords of his Councell repaired pre-Cently to the King, and did demonstrate to him of what importance were thefe effects. The King having his eyes unfealed from the pernicious Counsell of these young people, did well approve what his old Lords and Counsellers had presented to him, and prayed the Queen my Mother to repeale it, and to perswade my Brother to forget all that was paffed, adding that he was offended with those young people for it, and defired that by her means a reconcilement might be made betwixt Buffi and Quelus. This being determined, the guard was taken off my brother; and the Queen my Mother comming to his Chamber told him, that he was to thanke almighty God for the mercy vouchfafed him in his deliverance from fo great a danger, that the had feen the houre wherein the could not fo much as hope for his life; that fince he understood by this that the King was of fuch a heady humour that he tooke offence not onely at effects, but at empty imaginations, and running unconcrolledly in his opinion, without staying at any advice, would execute whatfoever his fancy did prompt him to, therefore to put him in no further N 2 grievances.

grievances, the defired him to put on a refolution to conform himfelfe in all things to his will, and that he would prefent himfelfe unto him without any show of discontent at the unjust proceedings which had paffed against his person; we made answer to her, that we had much to give thanks to God for his great mercy in fecuring us from the injuffice that was prepared for us, and that for this, next unto God we owed to her alone our fecond obligations, but the quality of my brother did not permit, that they should imprison him without a cause, and take him then from thence, without any formality of justification, or fatisfaction. The Queen replied that what already had been done God hinself could not cause to be undone, but they would recall the diforder that was made at his furprifall by making his deliverance with all the honour and farfsfaction that he could defire, that also it were requifice that he againe should content the King in all things, speaking to him with such affection and respect that the King thould remaine well pleased with it, and alfo that he would be a means that fuch a réconcilement fhould be made betwixt Buffi and Quelur that no more between them an occasion should be found for difconcontent or quarrell, avouching that the principall motive which produced all this counsel, and bad effects, was a fear that they had of the combat which old Buffe (a worthy father of fo brave a Son) had demanded, befeeching the King that he would permit him to be his fon Buffies Ses cond, and in the like manner, that Monfieur de Quelu might have his father to fecond him, that they foure might end the quarrell, without troubling the Court, or indangering fo many people. My brother promised that Buffi (feeing he had no hope to redresse himself) should, to come out of prison, performe any thing that the commanded; The Queen my mother, going downe unto the King, found him very willing that this deliverance should be made with honour; and to this purpose he came into the Chamber of the Queen my Mother, with all the Princes, the Lords and others of his Counsell, and sent Monsieur de Villequier to tell us he did attend our comming. Paffing through the halls and chambers, as we were going to his Majestie, we found them all full of people, who beheld us with teares falling from their eyes, prayfing God to fee us out of danger. Comming into the chamber of the Queen my Mo-N 3

Mother, we found the King with the company before rehearfed, who feeing my brother, faid unto him, that he would defire him not tothinke strange, nor be offended at what he had done, being compelled to it by the zeale which he had to the quiet and fafety of the State, that he now beleeved that he had no intention to disturbe his Kingdom or himselfe , My brother made answere, that he had vowed so much service to his Majestie, that he would thinke well of what soever he was pleased to have done, but he most humbly befought him to confider, that the devotion and fidelity which he had testified to his Majestie, did not deserve that rough intreaty, howfoever he accused nothing but his own unhappinesse, and was satisfied enough, if the King acknowledged his innocence. The King answered yes, there was no question of it to be made; and intreated him to relie on his love, as much as heretofore. On this, the Queen my mother joyned them hand in hand, and made them imbrace each other. Immediately the King commanded that Buff fould come forth, and be reconciled to Quelus, and that they should see Simier and Monficur de la Chastre at libertie- Buffi comming into the chamber, with that brave pre-presence which was naturall to him, the King told him that he would have an attonement made between him and Quelus, and that their quarrell (hould no more be mentioned, and commanded him to imbrace Quelus : Buffi made answere , Sir, if it be your pleasure that I should kisse him, I am well disposed to it, and accommodating his gettures to his words, he did accost him with the Pantaloone, and in a lovers complement did imbrace him, ar which all the company, though possessed, and almost astonished with the former pasfages, could hardly refrain from laughter: the more advised judged that it was too flight a fatisfaction which my brother received, and not to be parralel'd with fo great an Injury. This being done, the King and Queen my Mother comming to me, told me it was needfull also, that I should give then my hand, that my Brother should not entertaine the remembrance of any thing which might make him fart from the obedience which he owed to the King. I made answere that my brother was so wife, and had so much devotion to his service, that he had no need to be perswaded to it, either by me, or by any other, and that he never had, nor should receive any counsell from me, but N 4 what fhould be conformable to their will. and his duty. It being then three a clock in the afternone, and none having dined, the Queen my Mother defired that wee might dine altogether, and afterwards commanded my Brother and my felf to change our habits, which were fuitable to the fad condition wherein we lately were, and to make our felves ready to be at fupper withthe King, and afterward at the dancing. She was obeyed in those things which could be put off, and less behinde; but for the countenance, which is the lively Image of the Soul, the paffion of our just discontent was read in perfect Characters, and ingraven with all the force and violence of indignation and disdaine, as we had true caufe to finde it in all the acts of this Tragy-comedy, which being ended. Monfient de Seurre, whom the Queen my mother had given to my brother to lie in his chamber, and in whose discourse the often took delight, did chance to frand before her a this was a man of a disposition blunely flarpe, and who with a careleffe grace and affectation, would affirme unto himfelf the liberry of fpeaking any thing that came into his head, relithing fomthing of the humour of the Cynick Philusopher. My mother obferving ving him, faid unto him, Now Monsieur de Soure; And what fay you of all this? he replyed, It is too much in earnest, and roo little in jest; and turning to me, he frake forty, that my mother might not understand him . I doe not beleeve that this is the last act of the play, the man (speaking of my Brother) would deceive me much + if he should flay here still. This in this manner being paffed, the malady being healed without, and not within, the young people who poffeffed the King, conceiving of my Brothers nature and dispolition by their owne, and their unexperienced judgements not permitting them to differne of what force and vertue was his Countreys love unto a Prince fo rarely qualified as was my Brother, they perfwaded the King, joyning their cause to his, that my Brother would never forget the publick affront which he received, but would be alwayes warching an occafion to revenge it. The King, quite forgetting the former errour which these young people caused him to commit ; received this fecond Impression, and commanded the Captaine of the Guards to looke carefully to the gates, that my brother might not goe forth, and that every night they thould discharge the Lowre of all my brothers

thers fervants, leaving only him behinde, who usually lay in his chamber, or in his Waredrope. My brother feeing himfelf at the mercy of these young heads, who without either respect or judgement made the King dispose of him as they pleased, fearing least worse should come unto him, and having a fresh example of what without any ground or reason lately had befallen him, having three dayes entertained the apprehenfion of this danger, was refolved on the fourth, to remove from Court, and to retire to his owne house, nor return any more to Court, but with what speed he could, to dispatch his affaires for Flandens; he disclosed to me this refolution, and perceiving it was his best security, and that neither the King nor State should receive any prejudice by it, I did approve it, and contriving the means, because he could not get out of the gates of the Loure, which were fo curiously guarded, that stedfastly, and with great heed they looked in the face of all that passed in and out ; I concluded, there was no other way for him, but to get out at my Chamber window, which looked down into a deep ditch, and was two stories high; he intreated me to provide for this purpole, a firong cable, and of a sufficient length, length, which suddainly I procured, caufing a boy that was faithfull to me to carry out that day the cord of a bed, which was broken, in pretence to have it repaired. and thut againe, and within some few boures after, to bring it back, and with it, the cord that was necessary for us. The houre of supper being come which was on a fasting night, when the King Supped not, my Mother did sup alone in her little Hall. and I with her; my Brother although he was exceeding patient and discreet in all his actions being rouzed up by the remembrance of the affront which he received . and of the danger which threatned him. impatient to be gone, came unto me as I rose from table, and whispering in my eare defired me to make hafte, and repaire unto my own chamber, where he would attend me : Monfieur de Matignon who was not yet Marshall, a dangerous and fine Norman who loved not my Brother, being either adverised of it by some one who peradventure could not hold his peace, or conjecturing it by the manner which my brother spake unto me, said unto the Q. my Mother, as the was going to her Chamber, That without doubt my brother would be gone, that to morrow he would not be there, that he knew it very well, well, and that the thould doe well to give order to the contrary : I did even heare the words he spake, standing very neer my Mother, regarding and curioufly observing all that paffed, as those doe in the like estate, who being neer their utmost danger, or on the point of their delivery, are floring betwint feare and hope : I perceived that my Mother was much troubled arehe news which gave me the greater, apprehension to believe that we were discovered; entring into her Closet, the tooke me alide and faid; Have you heard what Matignon hath told me ? I made answer, I did not understand it Madame, but I perceive it is some bufineffe that doth afflict you; yes, the replyed, and that very much, for you know that I have answered the King that your Brother should not goe, and Matignon now is come to tell me that he knows he will not be here to morrow. Finding then my felfe in thefe two extreams beither to faile in my fidelity to my Brother, and put his life in hazard, or to fweare against the truth, a thing which I would not doe to escape a thousand deaths, I was in sogreat a perplexity that had not God affilted me, my fashion sufficiently had witheffed without my words, the fear I had that we were discovered, but as God affisteth good intentions, and his divine bounty joyned in this work of my Brothers fafety, I fo composed my lookes and words, that she perceived not any thing but that which I would have her, and that I offended not wy Soule or Conscience by any salse oath. I demanded of her, if too well the did not understand the hate which Monsieur Masignon did beare unto my Brother, that he was a spitefull difturber of all our quiet, and who did grieve to fee us live in concord, that when my Brother did goe I would answer it with my life; that I was confident, he having never concealed any thing from me, that he would have communicated this defigne unto me if he had an intention thereunto; this I faid, affuring my selfe that my Brother being safe they durit not doe me wrong, and choofing rather to ingage my life then to offend my foule by any false oath, or to put my Brothers life in jeopardy, She feeking not after any other feace of my words, replied; Be well advised what you say, you shall ferve as caution for him, and answer his ablence with your life; to which I fmiling did make answer, that it was that which I defired; and bidding her good night, I forthwith repaired to my Chamber, where putting off my cloaths with all diligence, hafting unto bed, to be the fooner ridde of the Ladyes and Gentlewomen that attended on me, I was left onely with the women of my Chamber, when prefently my Brother came in, and Simier and Cange with him, and having commanded them to look first into the ditch, to see if any one were there, we fastned the cord to the post of the window; we were ayded onely with my three women that lay in my Chamber, and with the boy that brought the cord; my brother, although it was a very greatheight, without any apprehenfion of feare descended first, and laughing at the danger went swinging and playing down; after him discended Simier in fuch a pittifull feare that he could scarce hold the rope for trembling; and last of all Cange the groom of his Chamber, God so happily did guide my bro. ther from being discovered that he came to Saint Geneviefue where Buffi did attend him, who by the confent of the Abby had made a hole in the Town wall, at which my Brother did goe forth, and finding there two hories ready, he retired to Angers without any misfortune. As Cange last-of all came downe, there arose a man from the bottome of the Ditch who began to run towards the lodgings neer the Tenis Court which is the way to the Corps de guard: I who in all this adventure apprehended not any thing which concerned my felf in particular, but onely the fafety or danger of my Brother, flood in a maze, ftrook through and through with feare, beleeving that man to be some one, who following the advise of Monsieur de Matignen was placed there on purpose to obferve us, and thinking that my Brother had been surprized I fell into a despaire, which cannot be represented but by an effay of things like to it: being in these perplexities, my women more curious then my felf, for my fafety and their own took the cord and put it into the fire, to the end that if the misfortune were fo great that the man who role out of the ditch, had been fet there to observe us, it might not be discovered; this cord being very long made to great a flame that it blazed out of the chimney, and was perceived by those of the Guard, who that night did watch : In a great fright and with loud importunity they came and knocked at my door defiring that fuddenly it might be opened, then I thought that my brother at that present had been taken, and that we both had been undone, having !

ving norwithstanding anchored my hope on God who preferred my judgement in fire a grace which his divine Majeffy was ever pleased in all my danger to vonchlase unto me) and perceiving that the cord was but halfe burned out, I fpake mito my women to goe gently to the doore to demand what they would have, and to fpeake fofely to them, as if I were afleepe, which they did, and they of the guard told them that a great fire came out of the tunnell of my chimney and made in the darke of night to bright a flame, that the danger of it did call them thither to extinguith it : My women made answer to them, it was nothing, and that they were able to quench it well enough themselves, and charged them to take heed that they did not waken me, on which they returned back. This alarm being paffed, fome two houres after, behold Monfieur de Loffe came to call me to the King & Queen my Mother, to give them an account of my brothers departure, being advertised of it by the Abbot of Saint' Genevifue, who to avoid all checks, and by my brothers own confent, when he saw himselfe farre enough from the danger of being intrapped, came to informe the King offe, telling him that he was furprized in his own house, house, and being shut up therein till a breach in the wall was made for my brothers escape, he could come no sooner to acquaint his Majestie with it; He found me in my bed, for it was yet night, and I fuddenly arifing, and putting on my nightgown, one of my women indifcreetly af frighted at it, tooke hold of my gowne, weeping and crying out, that I should never return unto them. Monfieur de Losse bearing her back, said, If this woman had done this before any but my felfe, who am your devoted servant, these words of hers might procure great trouble to you, but give thanks to God, and feare not any thing, for Monfieur your Brother is fafe. This assurance of his was to me a needfull, and no leffe welcome encouragement, to arme me to endure all the threats and choller of the King, whom I found fitting on the Queen my Mothers bed, in so great a passion, that I beleeve I should have found the effects of it, if the feare of my brothers abfence and my mothers presence had not They both said unro me, detained him. that I had obliged my felfe unto them, that my Brother should not goe, and had promised to answere for him; I replyed, that it was true, I had; but in this, that he had deceived me, as well as them, howfoever I durst affure them on the forfeit of my life, that his departure would bring no alteration in his service to his Majestie; and that he was only gone to his owne house, to give order in what was necessary for his voyage into Flanders. This afforance did a little qualifie the King, who gave me leave to return unto my chamber; not long after, there came news from my brother. which gave the King reassurances of his affection and obedience; this caused the complaint to cease, but not the discontent, shewing in apparence to be willing to affift him, but traverfing under hand the preparations of his Army into Flanders.

The Third Booke.

HE time Passing away it felse in this manner, I every houre sollicited the King to grant me leave to goe unto the King my husband, who perceiving that he no longer could denie me, nowilling that I should depart from him unsatisfied, and infinitely besides desiring to divert me from the friendship of my brother, he oblieged me to stay by all manner of bensits and perswasions, and gave me according to the promise which the Queen my mother had made at the peace of Sens, the affignation of my dowry in lands, and befides that, the nomination and disposure of certaine offices and places of preferment; and adding to the pension which the daughters of France were accustomed to receive, he allowed me an exhibition from hisowne coffers, and taking the pains to come and visite me every morning, he continually represented, how profitable would his friendship prove unto me, alleaging that my Brothers love would in the end procure my ruine, and that his would possesse me with a life as fafe as happy, with a thousand other reasons tending to the same purpose, in which he could never shake the fidelity which I had vowed to my brother, and could draw nothing from me but onely this, that my greatest defire was to see my brother in his favour, that it seemed to me that he deferved not to be removed from it, being confident that he would be most worthy of it by all humilitie of obedience, and devoted service: For my selfe, I acknowledged, I was obliged to him for fo much honour and benefits received, that he might well affure himself, that I would not faile him in whatfoever commandments he should enjoyee me to perform, and

and that I would travell in nothing more, then to preserve the King my Husband in his loyaltie. My brother being then upon his expedition into Flanders, the Queen my mother desired to goe to Alenson, to see him before his departure. I besought the King that he would be pleased I should accompany her, to take my farewell of my brother; to this, but to his griese, he gave permission.

Being returned from Alenson, having all things ready for my departure, I did again befeech the King, that he would give me leave to goe, to which he condifcended; the Queen my mother, who had a voyage alfo into Gafcogny, for the fervice of the King (that countrey having need either of his, or her prefence) refolved that I should not depart without her; and the Court removing from Paris, the King brought us to his Dolinville, where having entertained us certaine dayes, we tooke our leave of him, and a little after, we came into Guyenne, and travelled through all that Province, before we arrived at the government of the King my husband. He came to meet my mother as farre as La Reolle, a towne which those of the Religion did hold for the mistrust which did yet possesse them, the peace of that countrey trey being not fully established : He was bravely attended with all the Lords and Gentlemen of the Religion of Gascogny, and with some Catholicks. The Oueen my mother determined to make but a thort flay, but there intervened to many accidents on the Catholicks fide, and on the Huguenots, that the was constrained to make there her abode full 18. moneths, and being angry and weary of it, the would oftentimes alledge, that it was done on purpole by them to enjoy the prefence ofher Gentlewomen; the King my husband being strongly inamoured on Dayella, and Monfieur de Thurense on La Vergme, which was yet no hindrance unto me from receiving all defired love, and great honour from the King my husband, who from the beginning recounted to me all the projects and devices which were contrived in the time of his relidence at court, to work his diffention betwirt us, which he acknowledged were made on purpose to diffolye the friendship betwirt my brother and himself, and to thene us all three, and undiffemblinely expressed what a full content be did receive, that we were now together. Wee remained in this happy condition, during the time of my mothers abode in Gascogny, who after the had efter blifted blished the peace, changed the Kings Lievenant at the intreaty of the King my Husband, removing Monsieur the Marques of Villars, and putting in the place of him Monsieur the Marshall of Biron.

My Mother passing into Languedock, we conducted her as farre as Caftlenandarti, where taking our farewell of her, we returned to the Town of Pau in Bearne, which having not the exercise of the Catholick Religion, they onely permitted me to have Maffe faid in a little Chappell, which was but three or foure foot in length, and being very narrow, was full, when but feven or eight of us were in it. At the houre when Maffe was to be faid. the draw bridge of the Castle was lifted up, because the Catholicks of the Country who had not the exercise of their Religon should not heare it, for they were infinitely defirous to be present at the holy Sacrifice, from which for many years they were deprived, and being touched with a holy and devout defire, the inhabitants of that place found a meanes on the day of Pentecoft to come into the Caffle, before the bridge was drawn up, hiding! themfelves in the Chappel, where they were not discovered till Masse was almost ended, when the bridge being let down for some of

of my people to come into the Chappelly certain Huguenots klid espy them, and complained of them to Le Pin, who was Secretary to the King my Husband, this fellow infinitely did possesse his Master. and had great authority in his Court, and managed all the affayres for those of the Religion : Imediately he fent fome of the guard, who drawing them thence, and beating them in my presence, did throw them into prison where a long time they stayed, and payed great fines; I was the more fenfible of this indignity, because I expected no fuch matter: I complained to the King my Husband, and befought him that these poore Catholicks might bereleased, who deserved nor that chastisement, and being a long time restrained from the exercise of their Religion did now affemble themselves on my comming (the bester to celebrate the day of lo great a feast) to heare Masse in my Chappell; Le Pin without being called, did intrude himselfe, and without giving so much respect to his Master, as to give him leave to answer took the word out of his mouth, and told me that I should not trouble the head of the King my Husband with that marter, for fay I what I would , it never the fooner should be done, adding that they

they well deserved the punishment they and for my words they endured, should speed neither the better nor the worse, that I should content my selfe that Maffe was permitted to be faid for me, and for those my people whom I took with me. These words did much offend me, from a man of so mean a quality; I befought the King my Husband if I were so happy to have any part in his affection, that he would let me understand that he was sensible of the indignity which I received from that fawcy fellow, and that he would compell him to give me fatisfaction for it. The King my Husband perceiving how just my anger and discontent were, caused him to goe out of my presence; telling me that he was very forry for the indifcretion of le Pin, and that he should give me what fatisfaction I defired; that concerning the Catholick prisoners he would advise with his Counsellors of the Parliament of Pan, who should doe that which might comply with my request. Having faid this unto me, he went into his Closet, where he found Du Pin, who after he had spoken with him, changed all again; to that fearing I would request him to dishonour Le Pin out of his service, he shunned my presence, and diffembling with with me deferred what he promifed. the end feeing I grew refolute, thathe should abandon either Le Pin or my felfe, which of us he pleased, all those that were prefent, and who all traced Le Pin, faid unto him, that he ought not to discontent me for fo poore a fellow, that had fo arrogantly offended me, that if it should be brought to the care and knowledge of the King and Queen my Mother, they would take it very ill that he ftill did entertaine him. These words did conftrain him to put him away, but he ceased not to doe me evill offices, and to make me falle apparences, being perfwaded to it, as he hath rold me fince, by Monfieur de Pibrac who played double with us, who told me that I ought not to fuffer my felf to be outbraved by fo mean a fellow as Le Pin, and that whatfoever came of it, very necessiary it were, that I should put him thence; and faying to the King my Husband that there was no reason nor appearance that he should be deprived of the service of a man that was to utefull to him: Monfieur de Pibrac did this to incite me on the receiving of so many and great affronts to return into France, where he was attached in his efface by the Prefident, and one of the Councellors of the Councell of the King

King: and to make my condition yet worse, Dayella being gone, the King my Husband courted Rebours who was a nialitious wench that loved me not, and who did me all the bad offices which in her own behalf the could. In their afflictions having ever my recourse to God, in the end he had pitty of my tears and permitted that we should depart from the little Geneva of Par, whereas it fell out well for me, Rebourfe stayed fick behinde, from whom the King my Husband having removed his eyes, removed also his affection, and began to imbark himself with Fossensa who indeed was then a delicate girle, being very young and very beautifull. As we were in our way to Montauban, we paffed by a little Village named Eause, and were no fooner arrived there, but the King my Husband fell very fick of a violent and malignant fever accompanyed with an extream paine in his head, which lasted for the space of seventeen dayes, during which time he took no rest neither by day nor night, and continually we were removing him from one bed to another. I rendred my felf fo fervicable to him, that during his extreamities I never put off my cloaths nor departed from him, insomuch that he began to take delight in my fervice, and to commend it to all the world, and efpecially to my Confin Monsieur -- who performing the office of a good kinfman reeftablished me as deer as ever in the favour of the King my Husband, a happinesse which latted for the space of foure or five yeeres while I continued in Gascogny with him, making our aboad for the most part at Nerac, where our Court appeared fo full of lutre; that we envied not that of France; there was Madame the Princeffe of Navarre, the King my Husbands Sifter, who hath fince been maried to Monfieur the Duke of Bar, with my felfe and argreat number of other Ladies and young Gentlewomen, and the King my husband was artended with a brave troupe of Lords and Gentlemen fo richly qualified, that I have not feen more gallant personages in the Court of France, neither was there any thing in them that was reprovable, but only that they were Huguenots, but in this diverfity of Religion there was heard at all no noise of controversie, or contention of words. The King my Husband and Madame the Princeffe his fifter had recourse in their devotion to the Sermon, and I with my traine to the Maffe, which was said in a little Chappell in the Parke, from which when I came forth, we all reunited our selves to walke either in a verafaire garden whose allyes on each side were fet with Lawrell and Cypreffe trees, or in the park where were walkes of three miles in length, which I had caused to be made by the Rivers side, and the residue of our time we passed in all variety of honest pleasures, dancing being usually after dinner, and after supper. The King courted Fosseusa, who depending altogether on me, maintained her selfe with virtue and so much honour, that had she preferved it, the had not faln into that misfortune which reflected afterwards fo much on her, and on my felfe : but fortune envious of a life to happy, which was maintained by peace and union, in which had we continued, we might fecurely have contemned her malice, ftirred up a new fubiest of warre betwixt the King my Husband and the Catholicks, and wrought the King my Husband, and Monsieur the Marshall of Biron, who at the Huguenots request had charge of the Kings Lievrenant in Guyenne, to fo great an enmity, that doe I what I could to keep the King my Husband and him at peace, I could not prevaile, but they grew into a great defiance, and harred one of the other, each of them complaining to the King. King

King my Husband demanded that Monfieur the Marshall of Biron should be removed from the government of Guyenne, and Monfieur the Marshall taxed my Husband and those of the pretended reformed Religion to have enterprifed many things against the treaty of the peace. The beginning of this difunion did daily increase it felfe to my great griefe, being unable to redreffeit, and Monfieur the Marshall of Biron perswaded the King to come himfelf into Guyenne, alledging that his presence would fettle things in a better order, of which the Huguenors being advertised beleeved that the King came onely to demantle and to feize upon their Towns which made them refolve to have recourse to armes: this was that which fo much before I feared, and being now imbarked to run the fortune of the King my Husband and by consequence seeing my selfe to be on a fide contrary to that of my Religion: I spake to the King my Husband, and to all those of his Counsell to prevent it, shewing how little advantageous to them this warre was like to prove, where they had fo great a Chiefetaine to oppose them, as was Monfieur the Marshall of Biron, a great Captaine, and flrongly incenfed against them, who would not make a flourifh ith and dally with them, as others before had done but should he command the power of the King, and imploy them with presolution to drive them out of the Kingdome, they were not able to with-Rad Him! But the feare which they had of the Kings comming into Guyenne, and their hopes of many enterprises on the greatest part of the Townes in Gascogny and Languedock prevailed fo much, that skoughthe King did doe me the honour to put great trult and confidence in me, and the chiefe of the Religion did impute much to my understanding, yet I could not perswade them to that, which a little after to their expense they found too rue. The corrent uncontroul'd must run while, which shortly after will asswage his course, when they shall come to the experience of that which I foretold them; but long before they proceeded to these termes, feeing how the affaires disposed themselves, I often besought the King and Queen my mother to provide a remedy, by giving forme content to the King my husband, butchey made no reckoning of it, and it formech whey were glad that things were broughe to fach a paffe, being perswaded by the Manshall Biron, that he had found a means to reduce the Huguenots nots as low as he defired. This advice of mine being neglected, the grievances by degrees advanced themselves so farre, that in the end they had their recourse to armes. They of the pretended reformed Religion were much discontented, because they failed in their forces which they thought to have affembled, the army of the King my Husband being in number farre inferiour to that of the Marshall Biron, especially all their enterprises having miscarried, unleffe that onely on Cabon, which they tooke with Petards, with the loffe of many Souldiers, by reason that Monfieur de Vezins was there, who fought with them for the space of two or three dayes, and who, with them, fireet after freet, and house after house did dispute it out unto the laft, where the King my hufband made apparent both his wisdom, and his valour, not as a Prince of his quality, but as a brave and couragious Captain. The taking of this Towne did rather indammage, then advantage them, The Marshall of Biron finding his opportunity, took to the field, feizing on, and plundering all the little Townes which held for the Huguenots, and putting all to the edge of the fword. On the beginning of this warre, feeing the honour which the King my my husband did expresse unto me, commanded me not to abandon him. I refolved with my felf to run his fortune, not without an extream griefe to finde the motive of the warre was fuch, that I could not with the advantage of the one fide, or the other, without defiring it to my owne dammage: for if the Huguenots had the better, that would be the Ruine of the Catholick Religion, the prefervation whereof I preferred to my owne life, and if the Catholicks should win upon the Huguenots, I aw the ruine of the King my husband; neverthelesse my duty commanding me to stay with him; and retained by his love, and the confidence which he reposed in me, I wrote unto the King and Queen my mother of the estate wherein I faw that Countrey, to have them advise of those affaires, which I found they did too much neglect : I befought them, that if in confideration of me, they would not so much obliege me as to extinguish those flames, in the midft whereof I faw my felf exposed, that at least they would be pleafed to command Monfieur the Marshall of Birin, that the Towne wherein I made my abode, should be held in neutrality, and that within three miles of it there no hofilitie should be practifed; and that I Chould should obtaine as much of the King my husband, for those of his Religion. King did grant me this, provided that the king my husband should not be in Nerac, but if he were, that then the neutrality thould no longer be in force. This condition was observed on both sides, with as much respect as could be defired, but it could not withhold the king from comming often to Nerae, where Madame his fifter and my felfe were refident; it being his Nature to delight himselfe in the company of Ladies, and he was at that time extreamely inamoured on Fosseusa, whom he fervedever fince be forfooke Rebours, and from whom I received no bad office, and for this cause the king my husband did live with me in as much privacy and familiarity, as heretofore, feeing that I defired nothing more then his content in all things: These confiderations having brought him one day to Nerac, he stayed there three dayes after being unable to depart from a company fo delightfull to him. The Marshall of Biron, who watched for fuch an opportunitie, being acquainted with it, made as though he brought his army that way, to joyn with Monsieur de Cornusson the Senescall of Tholonge, on his passage over the river, who

who brought more forces to him, and in head of marching roward the river, he turned upon Nerac, and about nine of the clock in the morning, he presented himself with all his army in battell array, within a Canons thor of the towne; The King my husband (who received advertisement the night before of the comming of Cormiffen, defiring to hinder them from joyning their armies into one body) determined to fight with them apart, and was gone that morning on break of day to incounter with them on the passage over the river; but being deceived in his intelligence, for Monfieur de Cornuffon passed over the river the night before, he returned to Nerue, and as he entred in at one gate, he understood that the Marshall of Biron flood in battell array before the other, It was that day very florniy weather, and there fell to much raine, that the Harquebufes could doe no fervice. Nevertheleffe the King my husband cast some of his troupes amongst the Vines, to keepe the Marshall of Biron from approaching neerer, having not the meanes, by reason of the extreame raine which continued all that day to doe any other feare of warre. The Marshall of Biron stood all the while in battell array before our eyes, and difband-FROM banding onely three or foure of his company, who demanded in way of turnament to try their lances for the love of the Ladies, he kept his army intire, covering his artillery till he was ready to discharge, and on a fudden, making his troupes give way, and cleave afunder, he thundered against the Towne with feven or eight volleys of Canon (hot, whereof one of the bullets latched on the Castle, and having made this shot, he marched thence, sending a Trumpet to me to excuse himself, and to affure me, that had I been alone, he would not for all the world have attempted it. but I knew, he Gid, that it was articled in the neutrality concluded by the King, that if the King my husband should be at No rac, the neutrality should then be void, and that he had commandment from the King, to make warre upon the King my husband, in whatfoever place he found him. In all other actions, Monfieur the Marshall of Biron had rendred great refpet, and expressed himselfe a friend unto me; for my letters being fallen in the time of the warre into his hands, he fent them fafe, and fast fealed to me, and who foever fpake on my behalfe, received from him honour and good entreaty. I made reply unto his Trumpet, that I knew indeed that Mon-

Monfieur the Marshall had done no more then what pertained to the warre, and to the Kings commandment; but a man of his wifedome might well have fatisfied both the one and the other, without offending his friends, that he might well have given me leave for those three dayes to take pleasure in the contentment I received to fee the King my husband at Nerac, that he could not take him in my presence, but he must seize on me also, that I was highly offended at what he had done, and would complaine unto the King. after this continued a certaine time, those of the Religion having always the worfe, which did much affift me to prepare my husband, and dispose him to a peace. wrote often to the King and the Queen my mother concerning it, but they would not understand me, trusting to the good fortune which as yet accompanied Monfieur the Marshall of Biron.

In the same time that this warre began, the Towne of Cambray (which since my departure out of France, was brought under the obedience of my Brother, by the means of Monsieur de Ainsi, of whom I have spoken heretofore) was besieged by the Spanish forces, of which my Brother was advertised, being then at his house at

Ploffi les Tours, and was newly returned from Flanders, where he had received the Townes of Montz, Valencieunes, and fome others, which were under the government of the Count of Lalamy who complyed with my Brother, cauling him to be acknowledged for their Soveraigne in all the Countreys of his authoritie. My brother defiring to releeve it, had made a fudden preffe for Souldiers, intending with all speed to march downe with his army to raise the siege, and because it could not fo foon be ready, he put Monfieur Balamy into the Towne, to fultaine the leige, expecting the comming of the Army to relieve the Towne : As he was on those preparations, and began to draw his forces together, the warre with the Hugue. nots did interpose it selfe, which caused him to disband his troupes, to intoll themfelves in the army of the King', which was marching into Gafcoghy. This tooke from my brother all the hope to releeve Cambray, which he could not look, but he must loofe with it not only all the rest of the Countrey, which he had conqueted, but what most grieved him Monfieur de Balany alfo, and all those good Souldiers which he had per into Cambray. This displeasure fare deepe within him, and being

ing a Prince of great judgement, and who never fayled of expedients in his necessities, he perceived that the only remedy he had, was to pacific France, and having a courage that found nothing difficult, he undertooke to conclude a pence, and fuddenly disparched a Genelemante the King co perswade him to it; and to besetch him to give him the charge to mediate the peace this he did , fearing that those to whom it should have been committed. would be to tedious in the execution of their charge, that he should loofe the means and opportunitie to releeve Cambru, from whence Monfieur Bally, who had already endured the fury of the fiege, fent my Brother word, that he would give him fixe Moneths leifure to bring down his fuccours, but if at that time the Seige were not rayled, the necessitie and want of victualls would be fuch, that he should not have the meanes to reftraine the Inhableanes from furrendring the Towne. God to bleffed my brother in the defigne he had to perfuade the king unto the peace, that he gave confent unto it and was glad that my Brother offered himfelfe to bring it to effect, hoping by this means to divert him from his enterprise in Flander, to which he never was affected : He gave my brobrother the Commission to treate it, and conclude it, exhorting my Brother for his affiftance in it, to fend for the Lords of Villeroy, and Bellieure ; this Commission was wrought so happily by my brother, that comming into Gafagny (howfoever he stayed feven Moneths in the effecting of it, which time feemed to him as long againe, because of the labouring defire which he had to haften to the fuccour of Cambray, although the content which he received that I was with him, did much abate the eagerneffe of that care) yet he made a peace to the content of the king and all the Catholicks, leaving the king my husband and the Huguenors no leffe farisfied, having proceeded in it with so much wifedome, that he was beloved, and prayled of all, having also in this voyage wonne the love of that great Captaine, the Marshall of Biron, who did there yow himself his servant, to receive the charge of his army, which was going into Flanders, whom (to please the King my husband) my Brother removed from his government of Gafage my, and put in his place Monfieur the Marchall of Matignon; but before my Brother did depart, he did defire that accordance might be made betwixt the King my husband, and Monfieur the Marshall of

of Biron, who at the first fight made me facisfaction by an honest excuse, of that which passed at Nerac. I was enjoyned to our-brave him for it with all the sharpest and most disdainful language that I could; but I used the passionate command of my brother with fuch diferetion as was requifite to his affaires, knowing that the day might come wherein he might much rely on the affiftance of fo brave a Souldier. My brother returning into France, attended with Monsieur the Marshall of Biron, rereived no leffe honour and just glory for pacifying fo great a trouble to the content of all, then in the many victories he atchieved by armes, and made his army more great and powerfull; but what happinesse and glory is not attended with envie? The King taking no pleasure in it, and in the fixe or feven moneths time, while my brother and my felf were both together a treating of the peace in Gafcogmy, having had the leifure to finde an object for his anger, conceived that I had made that warre, and driven the King my husband to it (who well can witneffe the contrary) that my Brother might enjoy the honour of making the peace, which if it had depended on me, it had been done with more speed, and leffe paines, for his affaires affaires in Flunders and Cambray, received great disadvantage by this delay. But alas envie and hate doe blinde our eyes. and make us nor to fee things, as indeed they are. The King building on this falk foundation a mortall hatred against my Brother, and reviving in himself the remembrance of what was paffed, how when he was in Poland, and fince his return from thence, I ever had preferred my Brothers conventment and affaires above his owner owning alrogether at once, did vow my ruine and my Brothers; In which Fortune favoured his resolution, causing in the feven moneths space that my brother wasin Gafcogny, the unhappinelle to be fuch, that he fell in love with Foffen fa, to whom the King my husband was a fervantever fince he forlooke Achours : this being discovered, the King my husband was offended with me, beleeving that I did good offices for my brother, to withdraw the affection of Foffenda from him; this I no fooner understood , but I belought formuch my Brother in my behalf. prefenting to him what milerie might enfue to me byic, that he who affected my contenent above his owne, in this did force his passion, and spake no more unto hera Having on this fide found redreffe, Fortune, who when once thee beginneth to purfue, retireth never at the first counter-blow, prepared a new attempt more dangerous then the former, causing Fof-(mis who extreamly loved the King my husband, and who till then permitted him no other privacies, then what the honesty of a familiar love might well enjoy, to take from him all jealous thoughts which he had of my Brother, and to make him understand that she did love him alone, did so abandon her felf to content him in all things, that the mischiefe grew so great, that the was with Childe, and perceiving her felf in this estate, the changed all the manner of her proceedings with me, and in flead of her accustomed method, of being free and open, and of doing me all the good offices the could, to indeere me the more to the king my husband, the began now to conceale her self from me, and to render me as many bad offices, as heretofore the had done me good ones : She poffeffed so the king my husband, that in a little time, I found a great alteration; he estranged, he conceal'd himself from me, and took not that delight and pleasure in my company, as he had done for those foure or five happy yeers while we were in Gascogny, and when Fosseusa governed her felfe felfe with honour. The peace being concluded, my Brother returning into France, as I have faid, to levie his Army, the King my husband, and my felfe returned to Nerao, where as foone as we were arrived , Foffeifa, either to finde a coverture for her great belly, or to unburden her felf of what the had, did put it into the Kings head, to goe to the hot waters that are in Bearn. I befought the King my husband to excuse me, if I accompanied him not, for he knew that fince the indignitie I received at Pass, I had made a vow that I would never returne till there they had free exercife of the Catholick Religion, with great importunity he prefled me to goe, and was very angry at the excuses which I made: In the end he told me, that his Girle I for fo he called Fosseusa) had occafion to take those waters for the evill of her stomacke; I made answere that I was well content that the thould goe without me, and that it would make the world thinke evill of her, there being no reason for it : In the end I fo prevailed, that he was content to goe with her, taking two of her companions, which were Rebours and Ville favin, with their governesse. They departed thence, and I flayed behinde at Baviere : I had every day intelligence from

from Rebeurs, who was the whom the King heretofore had loved, and who was a corrupt and double-hearted wench, and defired nothing more then to turne Fofenfa out of favour, hoping to possesse againe her place in the affection of the King my husband, that Foffensa did me all the bad offices in the world, speaking of me reproachfull and disdainfull words; and perswading her selfe, if she had a Sonne, and could get cleere of me, that the thould be married to the king my husband, who returning from Baveire, was refolved to goe to Pan, and to take me with him, whether I would or no: These advertisements did much afflich me: nevertheleffe having my confidence in the mercy of God, and the goodnesse of the king my husband, I paffed the time of my abode at Baveire, in expecting him, and in powring out as many teares, as they dranke drops of water where they were, although the Catholick Nobility of that Country, with whom I was accompanied, tooke all the paines they could to make me forget my afflictions. At the end of five weeks, the king my husband returning with Fossensa, and her other companions, understood by fome of the Lords who were with me, what forrows I endured, for feare of going unto the Prais, which was the caufebene more frongly importanted me, but onely told me, he had a defire that I should goe, but feeing my teares and words did jount by witnesse unto him, that I had rather soe unto my grave, he changed his refolution. and returned to Nerse; whereseeing all spake of Foffenfaes bigneffe, and that it was not onelyall the talke at Court, but in the Countrey alfo, I took upon me to filence the report, and calling her incomy closer, fpake thus unto her: Although fome time is paffed fince you have estranged your felf from me, and I have been induced to beleeve that you have done me bad offices to the king my husband yet the love which I have borne unto you, and which I have vowed to persons of honor, to whon you appertaine, dothen joyne me to offer you all fuccour that may releeve you in the mishap whereinto you are fallen: I must intreat you that you would not be perverfe, norby refuling my love, to ruine both my honour and your owne; I have fo much interest in your reputation, that it is as deere to me as to your felf, and beloeve me. I will performe the office of a mother to you : Under the pretence of Peftilence, which you fee to be raging in this Countrey, and especially in this Towne, I have the

the opportunity to remove to Mas de Agewis, which is a private and retired manfion of the King my husbands : I will take with me no other traine, then whom you defire. In the meane time the King my husband shall spend his time in hunting, and that not fir from thence until you are delivered, and by this means, we may make the rumour cease which concerneth my felf as much as you : the in flead of giving methanks, with an extreame arrogance replyed, that the would make those know they lyed, that reported it, and speaking as lowd to me, as I spake soft to her, in a great choler the flung away, and fent the King my husband to me, who was very gry for what I had fooken to Foffenfa, aying that they were liars all, and that he would prove them fo that taxed her : long time he thus diffembled it with me, untill certaine moneths being expired, the houre of her delivery was come. pangs taking her in the morning about the break of day, being then in bed, in that chamber where all the Virgins lay, that attended on me, the fent for my Physitian to come unto her, and defired him to make hafte to acquaint the King my husband with it, which he did; We lay in one chamber, but in feverall beds, as our ufuall manner was, As the Physician cold him this, he found himselfe in a great perplexity, not knowing what to doe, fearing on the one fide that it should be discovered, and on the other fide, that the should be ill attended, for he loved her intirely. In the end he resolved to acquaint me with it knowing that although the highly had trespasfed again & me, yet he should finde me ready to doe him any service he commanded; he opened my curtaine, and faid unto me, Sweet heart I have concealed a thing from you, which is necessary that I now discover; I beseech you to excuse me, and to remember no more what I have told you on that Subject; only oblige me now fo farre, as prefently to rife, and make hafte unto Foffenfaes fuccour, who is very ill, I affure my felf, that knowing in what estate the is you will not call any thing to minde which heretofore hath paffed; You know how well I love her; in this I befeech you to obliege me to you: I replyed to him, that I honoured him too much to take offence at any thing which did proceed from him, and intreated him that he would be pleased to hunt that day, and take all his people with him, that it might not be difcovered. I caused her presently to be removed from the chamber of the Maides, and ledged her in a retired roome, and brought with me my Phisitian, and some trufty women to attend her, where very fafely she was delivered. It pleased God to fend her a daughter, which fince is dead. being delivered, we brought her back to the chamber of the Maides, where though we carried it with all privary and discretion, we could not hinder the report from being spread over all the Castle. King my husband being returned from hunting, made haste to see her. She desired him that I might come unto her, as my manner was, to vilite all my young wemen when they were not well, hoping by this meanes to stop the buffe rumour that ranne ofher. The King my husband came forthwith into my chamber, and found me lying on my bed, being very weary with my early rifing, and with the paines I took to affift Foffensa in her childing throwes, and defired me that I would rife, and goe unto her : I made answere, that when she had need of my helpe, I was not absent, but keing there was nothing to be done, if I should goe, I should discover rather then conceale the bufineffe, and that every finger did point at me already. word he grew very angry, and what most did grieve me, me thought that what I had done that morning did not deferve that recompence. While thus paffed the occurrences of our affaires, the King, who was not ignorant of any thing that was done in the houses of the Great ones of his kingdome, and who was precifely curious to know the deportments of our Court, didcause the Queen my Mother to write unto me, that the had a great defire to fee me, that it was too much for five or fixe yeeres to be removed from her, that it was now time to take a journey unto Court, and that it should much conduce to the affaires of the King my husband, and my owne : The King himfelf did afterwards write unto me to the fame effect, and caused fifteen hundred Crowns to be delivered to me that no inconvenience might delay me, and the Queene my Mother fent me word, that the would come her felfe into Xanteigue, and if the King my husband would accompany me thither, The had some businesse there to communicate unto him, and to give him the affurance of the Kings good will. All these faire apparences could not deceive me in the fauits which were to be expected from the Court , having had already too much experience of it, but I resolved to receive some profit by thefe hele offers to advance my own occasions, and the affaires of the King my husband, hoping also it would prove a means to divert him from Foffenfaes love, whom I determined to take along with me, and that the King my husband feeing her no more, might possibly imbarke himself with some one else that might not prove so crosse and spitefull to me. I had much to doe to perfwade the King my husband to give confent unto this journey, because it grieved him to loofe the company of Fosseufe, and because the fame of her late mischance being every where noised abroad, he joyntly began to fuffer in his reputation with her. He made me better cheere then ordinary, and laboured very much to take from me the defire of going into France. But having already made promife by my letters to the King and Queen my mother, and more especially having received the sum abovefaid for the voyage, the misfortune which drew me thence, took away with it againe the defire which I had to goe, becausethe King my husband did begin to expresse more friendship and affection to mee.
